a and fomtimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth with his frendes and other officers of the same. What soeuer he could spare and get in the warres. he foent it in buying of goodly horses, in makinge of fayer armors, or payinge his poore con- Philippanie try mens ransome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goodes & reuenue, he nes gaines fought onely to increase them, by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the instest and best smoothed way of getting of goodes. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and ftu Philopamedy apon it, as one that thought it fit for every noble man & gentleman fo to travaill, governe, nes fludy and and increase his owne, that he should have no occasion to couet or vsurpe an other mannes. Hetookeno pleasure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to read all fortes of bookes of Philosophy but those onely that would teache him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much n care to read Homers workes, fauinge those places onely that stirred vp mens hartes most vnto valliantnes. But of all other stories, he specially delited to read Euangelus bookes, which wear Philopanne ted of the discipline of warres, how to set battells, and declared the actes and geastes of walks nes deline to xander the great, fayinge: that men shoulde euer bringe his wordes vnto deedes, onlessent lue booker of would take them for vaine stories, and thinges spoken, but not to profit by. For in his bookes in distipline of the feates of warre, and how battells shoulde be ordered, he was not onely contented to fee; of warre. them drawen and fet out, in cartes and mappes: but would also put them in execution, in the places them selues as they were set out. And therefore, when the army marched in order of hattell in the fielde, he woulde confider and study with him selfe, the sodaine euentes and approches of the enemies, that might light upon them, when they comming downe to the valky, or going out of a plaine, were to passe a river or a ditche, or through some straight : also when he should spread out his army, or else gather it narrow; and this he did not only forecast by him felfe, but woulde also argue the same with the Captaines that were about him. For Philonamen doubtlesse was one of the odde men of the worlde, that most esteemed the discipline of warre, (and fometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the most large field and most frutefull ground that valliantnes could be exercised in: so that he despised & contemned all that were no fouldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares? ofage, Cleomenes kinge of LACED E'MON, came one night vpon the fodaine, and gaue an aft fault to the city of M EG AL IPOLIS, so lustely, that he draue backe the watche and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopamen hearinge of it, ranne immediatly to the refcue. Ne-1 Philopamen D verthelesse, though he fought very valliantly, and did like a noble souldier, yet he coulde not faued the repulse the enemies, nor drive them out of the city. But by this meanes he got his citizens lead the from clefure, and some time to get them out of the towne to faue them selues, staying those that fold omenes king lowed them: and made Cleomenes still waite vpon him, so that in the end he had much a do to of Spara. faue him selfe being the last man, and very fore hurt, & his horse also slaine vnder him. Shorte: very fore ly after, Cleomenes being aduertised that the MEGALOPOLITANS were gotten into the city of hour. MESSINA, sent vnto them to let them understad, that he was ready to deliuer them their city. lands, & goods againe. But Philopamen feeing his contrymen very glad of these newes, & that euery man prepared to returne againe in half:he stayd them with these perswasions, shewing them that Cleomenes deuise was not to redeliuer the their city, but rather to take the together!

E with their city: foreseeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked? walles and empty houses, and that him selfe in the ende should be compelled to goe his way. This perswasion stayed the MEGALOPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleamenes occasion to burne and plucke downe a great parte of the city, and to cary away a great fumme of money. and a great spoyle, Afterwardes, when kinge Antigonio was come to aide the ACHAIANS 24 King Antigo. gainst Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the toppe of the mountaines of Sollafia, and kepelnus came to all the passages and wayes vnto them out of all those quarters; king Antigorus set his army in chair against battel hard by him, determining to fet upon him, and to drive him thence if he could possibly clement Philopemen was at that time amongest the horsemen with his citizens, who had the It with the way Ans on the fide of them, being a great number of footenen & excellent good fouldiers, which is the state of them being a great number of footenen & excellent good fouldiers, which is the state of the p, did thut in the taile of all the army. So they were commaunded to fland ftil, and tokepe their were commaunded to fland ftil, and tokepe their were commaunded to fland ftil, and tokepe their were commanded to fland ftill the commanded the commanded to fland ftill the commanded the commanded the commanded the commanded the command place, vntill fuch time as they did show them a redde coate of armes on the toppe of a pyke france hards from the other wing of the battell, where the king him selfe stoode in persone. Notwith a dis viscomme.

ding this straight commundement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no lengtr. A but went to fee if they could force the LACED EMONIANS that kept on the top of the mount taines. The ACHAIANS contrariwife, kept their place and order, as they were commaunded Euclidas. Cleomenes brother, perceiuing thus their enemies footemen were feuered from their horsemen lodainly sent the lightest armed souldiers & lustiest fellowes he had in his bands, to geue a charge voon the ILLYRIANS behinde, to proue if they could make them turne the faces on them, bicause they had no horsemen for their garde. This was done, and these links armed men did marueloufly trouble and diforder the LLYRIANS. Philopamen perceiuinge that, and confidering howe these light armed men would be easily broken and driven backe. fince occasion selfe inforced them to it: he went to tell the kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes. But when he faw he could not make them understand it, and that they made no reckening of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, bicause he had not yet attained any credit or estimacion to be judged a man, that could invent or execute any stratageame of warre the went thither him felfe, and tooke his citizens with him. And at his first comming, he so trous bled these light armed men, that he made them flie, and slue a number of them. Moreover to encorage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them geue a lufty charge vpponthe enemies, whilest they were thus troubled and out of order: he left his horse, and marcheda foote vp hill and downe hill, in rough and ftony wayes, full of springs and quauemyres, being heavely armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fightinge in this forte very painefully and vneafily, he had both his thighes past through with a dart, havinge a leather thonge on the middeft of it. And though the blow did not take much holde of the fleshe, yet was it a stronger blow for it pearced both thighes through & through that the iron was seene on thother side. Then was he so combered with this blow, as if he had bene shackled with irons on his seen.

maruelously, when they thought to have pulled the darte out of the place where it entred in fo as never a man about him durft fet his handes to it. Philopemen on the other fide, feeingthe fight terrible on either fide, and would soone be ended: it spited him to the guttes, he would to faine have bene among them. So at the length he made fuch struggling, putting backeone thigh, and fetting forward an other, that he knapped the staffe of the darte a funder, and made them pull out the two troncheons, the one on this fide, and the other on the other fide. Then when he faw he was at liberty againe, he tooke his fword in his hande, and ranne throughthe) middeft of them that fought, vnto the foremost ranckes, to meete with the enemy: so thathe gaue his men a newe corage, and did fet them on fyre with enuy, to followe his vallianmelle, After the battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captaines, to proue them: who moued the horfemen to deuide them felues, and give the charge, before the fignethan was commaunded. They aunswered him, that they were forced to doe it against their willes. bicause a young MEGALOPOLITAN gentleman gaue a charge with his company, beforethe figne was given. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played theparte of a wife and valliant Captaine. This exployte, together with Antigonus testimony, gaue great skill of a foul. reputacion vnto Philopamen, as we may eafily imagine. So king Antigonus maruelously interted him he would ferue with him, and offered him a bande of men at armes, and great enter> tainement, if he would go with him. But Philopamen refused his offer, and chiefly, bicauselse knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commaunded by any. Nothwithstan-> dinge, bicause he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into CRETA, where he know there were warres, onely to continue him felfe in exercife thereof. So when he had ferueda and knew not what to doe: for the leather fastened in the middest of the darte, did greue him longe time with the CRETANS, which were valliant fouldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of warre, and moreouer were men of a moderate and spare diver he returned home againe to ACHAIA, with so great credit and reputation of every one, that he was presently chosen Generall of all the horsemen. So when he entred intohis charge, he founde many horsemen very ill horsed, upon litle Iades, such as might be gotten cheapest, & how they yet buttomen of norto goe them selves in persone to the warres, but did sende other in their steade: and to be shorte, how they neither had hartes, nor experience of the warres, and all bicause the Generalls and Captaines of the people of the Acharansthat ferued before him, did take no heat

A to those matters, as fearinge to offende any, bicause they had the greatest authority in their handes, to punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopamen fearinge none of all these thinges, would leaue no parte of his charge and duety vindone, but went him felfe in persone to all the cities, to perswade and encorage the young gentlemen, to be well horsed, and well armed, that they might winne honor in the fielde, be able to defende them felues, and ouerthrow their enemies. And where perswasion could doe no good, there he would set fynes vnon their heades that so refused, and did vie to muster them oft, and did acquainte them with rilring, turning, and barriers, and one to fight with an other, and at fuch times and places fpe-B perty is, to keepe their order and ranckes in the battell. So as when necessitie ferued for the cially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to give them the lookinge on : that in thorte space he made them very forwarde, proper, andready horsemen, whose chiefest prowhole company of horsemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or else euery man by him felfe: they were fo throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe fet in battell ray. did seeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued so together, and withall so easily, and at all times, and fooft, as turne they woulde on the one fide, or on the other. Now in a great hattell the Achaians had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the river of Lariffus: Demoblantus, Generall of the horsemen of the Æ TOLIANS, came from his company to fight with i hilopamen, who also made towardes him, and gave him first such a blow with his speare, that he strake him starke deade. When Demophantus fell to the grounde, his fouldiers fled by Philopanners and by vpon it. This wanne Philopamen great honor, who gaue no place to the youngest men flue Democ infighting most valliantly with his owne handes: nor to the oldest men in wisedome, for the phonous Gewise leading of his army. In deede the first man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in po- horsemen of wer and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAIA was of small reckeninge, bicause the AEtothe cities of the same stoode deuided between them selues, and Aratus was the first manne The praise of that made them iowne together, and stablished amonge them an honest civill government, Philopamen Whereby it happened, that as we fee in brookes and rivers where any litle thinge stoppeth Aratus raifed Achaia to and falleth to the bottome, which the course of the water bringeth downe the streame, there greaters. the rest that followeth doth vie to stay, and goe no further : even so in the cities of GREECE that were in harde state, and fore weakened, by faction one against an other, the ACHAIANS were the first that stayed themselues, and grewe in amity one with the other, and afterwardes

Aratus lived, they depended most apon the strength and power of the MACED ONIANS: first with stickinge vnto kinge Ptolomie, and then vnto Antigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in manner all the state of GREECE. But when Philopamen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefest Philopamen man, the ACHAIANS beinge stronge enough to resist the strongest, woulde marche then no and Aratus more under any other bodies enfigne, nor woulde fuffer any more thraunge gouernors or Araus a lefe Captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it seemed) was somewhat to softe and colde for the manin wares. E warres, and therefore the most thinges he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the kinges frendshippes with whome he was great, as we have at large declared in his life. But Philopamen beinge a manne of execution, hardy and valliant of persone, and of rage and hartes of the ACHAIANS: bicause vnder his charge they ever foiled their enemies, and alwayes hadde the vpper hande ouer them . The first thinge Philopæmen beganne withall at his comming, he chaunged the manner of fettinge of their tables, and their facion of arminge them sclues. For before they caried litle light targettes, which bicause they were der and discithinne and narrowe, did not couer halfe their bodies, and vied speares farre shorter then pline of wars, pykes, by reason whereof they were very light, and good to skirmishe and fight a farre of:

very good fortune, in the first battell that he euer made, did maruelously encrease the co-

D drewe on the rest of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederats.

Some by helpinge and deliueringe them from the oppression of tyrans, and winninge other also by their peaceable gouernment and good concorde: they had a meaninge in this wife, to bringe all the contrie of PELOPONNESUS into one body and league. Neuertheleffe, while

F but when they came to joyne battell, their enemies then hadde great vantage of them. As for the order of their battelles, they knewe not what it ment, nor to cast them selves into asnaill or ringe, but onely vsed the square battell, nor yet gaue it any such fronte where the pykes of many ranckes might pushe together, and where the fouldiers might stande so close that their targettes should touch one an other, as they do in the squadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reason whereof, they were soone broken, and ouerthrowen. Philopenes. reformed all this, perswading them to vie the pyke and shielde, in steade of their litle target, fpeare. or borestaffe, and to put good morryans or burganettes on their heades, corfelenes on their bodies, and good taffes and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not geuinge a foote of grounde, as light armed men that runne to and fro in a skirmishe. And thus havinge perswaded and taught the younge men to atme them selues throughlie, first he made them the bolder and more coragious to fight, as if they had bene menne that coulde not have bene overcome : then he turned all their vaine fuperfluous charge, into necessarie and honest expences. But he could not possibly bring them al. R together from their vaine and riche apparell, they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceede an other: nor from their sumptuous furniture of houses, as in beddes, hanginges, curious service at the table, and delicate kinde of dishes. But to beginne to withdrawe thisde. fire in them which they hadde, to be fine and delicate, in all superfluous and vnnecessarie things, and to like of thinges necessarie, and profitable: he wished them to looke more nerebreakinge of younge horses, and younge men exercisinge armes. Womens handes also were full of morryans and heade peeces, whereto they tyed goodly braue plumes of feathers of fundry colours, and were also full of imbrodered arminge coates and cassockes, with curious and very riche workes. The fight of which brauerie did heave vppe their hartes, and made them gallant and lively: fo as enuy bred straight in them who shoulde doe best service, and no way spare for the warres. In deede, sumptuousnesse and brauerie in other sightes, dothse cretely cary mens mindes away, and allure them to feeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womanishe persones: bicause this sweete ticklinge, and intifinge of the outwarde sence that is delighted therewith, doth straight melt and soften the strength and li corage of the minde. But againe, the fumptuous cost bestowed apon warlike furniture, doth to exercise them continuallie in armes: wherein they did not onely shewe them selues obdient to him, but did moreouer striue one to excell an other, and to doe better then their fellowes. For they liked maruelous well the orderinge of the battell he hadde taught them, bicause that standinge so close together as they did, they thought surely they coulde hard !

ly be ouerthrowen. Thus by continuaunce of time, beinge muche vied to weare their arly to their ordinarie charge about them felues, takinge order as well for their apparell, as also for their diet, and to spare in them, to come honorablic armed to the fielde, for defence of their contrie. Thereuppon, if you had looked into the goldesmithes shoppes, ye should have into brane & feene nothinge else in their handes, but breakinge and batteringe of pottes of golde and filuer, to be cast and molton downe againe, and then gildinge of armors and targettes, and silver uering of bittes. In the showe places for the runninge of horses, there was mannedging and incorage and make great a noble harte. Euen as Homer fayeth it did Achilles, when his moincorageth ther brought him newe armor and weapons, the hadde caused Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who feeinge them, coulde not tarie, but was straight fette on fire with defire to occupie them. So when Philopæmen hadde brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good passe, to come thus brauely armed and furnished into the fielde, he begannethen

mor, they founde them a great deale easier and lighter then before, besides the pleasure they tooke to fee their armor fo braue, and fo riche: infomuch as they longed for fome occasion to trye them straight uppon their enemies. Now the Achains at that time were at warrs with Machanidas, the tyranne of LACED EMON, who fought by all deuise he coulde with a great armie, to become chiefe Lorde of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the contrie of the MANTINIANS, Philopemen straight marched towardes him with his army : so they mett bothe not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put them selves in order of battell. They both hadde entertayned in paye a great number of straungers to serue them, besides the whole force F of their contrie : and when they came to joyne battell, Machanidas with his straungers gaue such a lustie charge vppon certainessinges and archers being the forlorne hope whome a Philopamen had cast of before the battell of the Achaians to beginne the skirmishe, that he Battell fought overthrew them, & made them flie withal. But where he should have gone on directly against bemene Phithe ACHAIANS that were ranged in battellray, to have proved if he could have broken them: Machanidas, he was very busie, and earnest still, to follow the chase of them that first fled, and so came hard by the ACHALANS that stoode still in their battel, and kept their ranckes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but call away. But Philangemen made as though it had bene nothinge, and that he fet light by it, and foving the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the fourre, whom they had overthrowen, and straying so farre from the battell of their footemen, whome they had left naked, and the field open apon them: he did not make towardes them to stay them, nor did striue to stop R the that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered the to take their course. And when he faw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his mensmarche apon the LACED & MONIANS, whose sides were naked, having no horesemen to gardthem: and so did fet upon them on the one fide, and ranne so hastely on them to winne one of their flancks. that he made them flie, and flue withall a great number of them. For it is faid, there were foure thousand LACED & MONIANS slaine in the field, bicaule they had no man to leade them: and our came moreouer, they fay they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the fielde. Machanidas whe they faw Machanidas chasing stil those vpon the spurre, whom he had ouerthrowe. After amp spran of this. Philopamen retyred to mete Machanidas, who came backe from the chase with his straungers. But by chaunce there was a great broade ditch between them, so as both of them rode vconthe banckes sides of the same, a great while together, one against an other of them:thone fide feking fome convenient place to get over and flie, & the other fide feking meanes to kepe them from starting away. So, to see the one before the other in this sorte, it appeared as they had bene wild beaftes brought to an extreamity to defend them felues by force from fo fierce ahunter as Philopæmen was. But whileft they were striuing thus, the tyrans horse that was lufly and coragious, and felt the force of his masters spurres pricking in his sides, that the blood followed after, did venter to leape the ditche, comminge to the banckes fide, floode apon his hindemost legges, and aduaunced forward with his foremost feere, to reach to the other side.

Then Simmias and Polyanus, who were about Philopamen when he fought, ran thither straight to kepe him in with their bore staues that he should not leape the ditche. But Philopamen who D was there before the, perceiving that the tyrans horse by lifting up his head so high, did cover all his maisters body: for sooke by and by his horse, and tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyran with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory whereof, the Philopamer A CHALANS that did highly esteeme this valliant acte of his, and his wisedome also in leadinge sue Machaof the battell: did fet up his image in braffe, in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme nidsa. he flue the tyran. They fay, that at the affembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they folemnife in honor of Hercules, not farre from the citic of ARGOS) and not long after he had wonne this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second time of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and beinge at good leafure also by reason of the feast: he first shewed all the GREEC IANS that were comethither to fee the games and pastimes, his army raunging infor-E der of battell, and made them see how easily they remoued their places every way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troublinge or confoundinge their ranckes, and that with a maruelous force & redines. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the musitians play, and sing to their instrumentes, who should winne the best game, being accompanied with lufty young gentlemen apparrelled in purple clokes, and in skarlet coates & cassockes they ware apon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well given & disposed:who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & besides that, shewed the selves: inwardly of noble hartes, being incoraged by many notable battells they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victory, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chauce, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the mulitian, finginge certaine poemes of Time-

F theus, called the Perfes, fell into these verses. O Greekes, it is even he, wwhich your prosperity Hath given to you: and there with all a noble liberty.

Philosemen. bis the tyran of Lacede-Philopame nes seconde jorney into Creta difcom-

When he had sweetely song out allowde these noble verses, passingly well made: the whole A affembly of the GREBCIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to fee the games, caff all their eyes straight vpon Philopamen, and clapped their handes one to an other for iov, bi. cause of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should foone recourt their auncient reputacion, and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy mindes of their auncesters. And as younge horse that doe alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinario riders, if any straunger get vp on their backes, do straight waxe straunge to be handeled, and make great a do: euen fo, when the ACHAIANS came to any daungerous battell, their harres were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopamen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they fawe him ener, the whole army rejoyced, and defired straight to be at it, they had fuch confidence in his valliantnesse and good fortune : and truely R not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stande before him: bicause they were asrayed to heare his name only, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip kinge of MACEDON, imagining that if he could finde meanes to dispatche Philopemen out of the way, how soeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would straight take parteagaine with him: fent men fecretly into the city of ARG os, to kill him by treason. How beit the practise was difcouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GREECIANS generally, and no ken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIAN slayed fiege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainly to have wonne it at the first affault: there role a rumor fodainely amongest them, that Philopamen came to aide the city, and was not same Legamin made from it with his army. But it was a falle reporte. Notwithstandinge, the Bobotianswere of scared, that for feare they left their scaling ladders behinde them, which they had set against the walls to have scaled the towne, and fled straight to save them selves. An other time, when Nabis the tyran of LACED EMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had taken the city of Messi-NA vppon the sodaine: Philopamen being then a private man, and havinge no charge of souldiers, went vnto Lylippus, General of the Achaians that yere, to perswade him that he would fend present aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lysippus told him, it was to late now to goe thither. and that it was but a lost towne, not to be holpen: considering the enemies were in it already, Philopæmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither him selfe with the force of MESSINA only, not staying for the affembly of the MEGALOPOLITANS, that were in confell about it, to give him commission by voyces of the people to take them with him: butthey D all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continual! Generall, and the man that by nature was worthieft of all other to commaunde them. Now when he came neere vnto MES-SINA, Nabis hearinge of his comminge, durst not tary him, though he had his army within the city, but stale out at an other gate, and marched away in all the hast he could, thinking him selse a happy man and he could so escape his handes, and retyre with safety, as in dede he acomerca inte na from Na- hitherto concerning Philopamen, falleth out doutlesse to his great honor and glory: but afterwardes he was greatly dispraised for a iorney he made into CRETA, at the request of the Gor-TYNIANS, who fent to pray him to be their Captaine, being fore troubled with warres at that time. Bicause Philopamen went then to serue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyranne Nabis had E greatest warres with the MEGALOPOLITANS, in their owne contry: they laid it to his change, either that he did it to flie the warres, or else that he fought honor out of feafon with foreme nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALOPOLITANS were in fuch distresse, that their contry being loft and destroyed, they were driven to keepe them within their city, and to low all their voide groundes and streetes in the same with corne, to susteine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hard at their towne gates. And the rather, bicause him felfe making warres with the C RET ANS, and feruing straungers beyonde the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemyes occasion to slaunder him that he fled, that he would not tary to fight for defence of his contry. Againe, there were that fayd, bicause the Achaians did choose other for their Generall, that he being a private man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had maruelously intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that coulde not abide to liue idlely, and that defired specially about

A all things to ferue continually in the warres, and to put in practife his skill and discipline in the leading of an army. The wordes he spake one day of king Ptolomie doth witnesse as much. For when there were some that praised king Ptolomie highly, saying that he trained his army well, and that he still continued his persone in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (favd he) of his yeares, to delite in traininge his men to exercise armes, but to doe some acto him selfe in persone. Well, in the ende, the MEGAL OPOLITANS tooke his abscence in such cuil parte, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needes have banished him, and put him from the freedome of the citie: had not the ACHAIANS fent their Generall Ariflanetty vnto them, who would not fuffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was euer contention between them about matters of the common R wealth. Afterwards, Philopamen perceiuing his contrymen made no more accompt of him, Philopamen to fright them withall, he made diverse small villages and cities rebell against them, & taught made diverse them to say, & to give it out, that they were not their subjects, neither payed them tribute from the beginning : and he made them stande to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the Achaians. city of MEGALIPOLIS, before the councell of the ACHAIANS. These things happened shortly after. But whilest he made warres in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he shewed not himself APELOPONNE SIAN, nor like a man borne in Arc ad Ia, to make plaine & open warres; but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vie their owne policies, fine deuiles, & ambushes The Cretans against them selues. And made them know also, that all their crafts, were but childish sportes politicke men as it were : in respect of those that were deuted, and put in execution, by a wife experienced Captaine, and skilfull to fight a battell. So, Philopamen having wonne great fame by his actes done in CRETA, returned against to PELOPONNESVS, where he founde, that Philipkinge of MACED ON had bene ouercome in battell, by Titus Quintius Flaminius: and that the ACHAI-ANS joyning with the ROMAINES, did make warre against the tyran Nabis, against whome he was made Generall immediatly ypon his returne, and gaue him battell by fea. In the which it feemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the event of this battell fallinge out Philosomen much worse with him, then was looked for, in respect of his former corage and valliantnesse, made Gene-But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of Asia, and the Iles, without any rall of the Asian a exployte done, bicaufe he would not have his contrymen fleshed with spoyle by sea, as fearing gainst Nabie, leaft of valliant fouldiers by lande, they would by litle and litle (as Plato favd) become diffolute n mariners by sea. But Philopæmen contrariwise, presuming upon the skill he had to set the battellingood order by lande, woulde needes take vppon him to do the same by sea. But he was Philopamen taught to his cost to know what exercise and experience ment, and howe stronge it maketh our come by them that are practifed in thinges. For he loft not onely the battell by fea, beinge vnskilfull of fea. that feruice: but he committed besides a fowler errour, For that he caused an old shippe to be rigged, which had bene very good of feruice before, but not occupied in forty yeares together, and imbarked his contrymen into the fame, which were all likely to perish, bicause the shippe had diverle leakes, by fault of good calking. This overthrow made his enemies despise him vtterly, who persivaded them selues he was fled for altogether, and had given them sea roome: whereupon they laved siege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopemen beinge aduertised thereof, Nationales imbarked his men fodainely, and fet vpon his enemies ere they wift it, or had any thought of geth the city his comming : and founde them straggling vp and downe, without watch or garde, by reason of Gythium. of the victory they had lately wonne. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and fet fyre vppon his enemies campe, and burnt it every whitte: and in this feare and hurly burly, flue a great number of them. Shortely after this stealing apon them, the tyran Nabis also stole apon him againe vnwares, as he was to goe through a maruelous ill and daungerous way. Which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the first, thinking it vnpossible for them that they could euer scape that daunger, considering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabours. But Philopamen bethinking him felfe, and confidering the nature & scituacion of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainly then, that the chiefest point of a good fouldier, and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, accordinge to the time and sci-tuacion of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and forted it according to the scituacion of the place, wherein he was compassed: and by doinge this without

ANS beinge aduertised of it, beganne to prepare to punish them. The LACED EMONIANS OR the other fide preparinge for the warres, did fet all the contry of PELOPONNES VS in armes.

Hereupon Philopamen lought to pacific Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the Romaines, being at warres together at that present time, and they both having

PHILOPOEMEN. 404 Philippamen trouble or busines, he tooke away all feare of daunger, and gaue a charge upon his enemies in A overcome Nat fuch fierce wife that in a shorte time he put the all to slight. And when he perceived that they did not flie all in troupes together towardes the city, but scattering wife, abroade in the fieldes in every place; he caused the trompet to found the retreate. Then he commaunded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the contry thereabout was full of thicke woddes and groues, very ill for horsemen: and also bicause there were many brookes, vallies, and quane myres which they should passe ouer, he encamped him selfe presently, being yet broade day And so, fearing e least his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after ano. ther, and by couples: he fent a great number of ACHAIANS, & laid them in ambush amongest the brookes and hilles neere about it, which made great flaughter of Nabis fouldiers, bicause they came not altogether in troupes, but featteringly one after an other as they fled, one here, R an other there, and so fell into their enemies handes, as birdes into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopamen singularly beloued of the GREECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters and common affemblies. Whereat Titus Quintius Flaminius, of nature very ambitious, and couetous of honor: did much repine, and was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Consul of Rome should have place & honor amongest the Achaians, before a meane gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deferued better of all GREECE, then Phi-Lypemen had: confidering, howe by the onely proclamation of an heraulde, he had reftored

GREECE againe to her auncient liberty, which before his comminge was subject vnto kinge

Philip, and vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwardes, Titus Quintius made peace with the tyran fmale encrease of their power, and being joyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreouer he wan by this meanes, the love and good will of all the honest men of LACED EMON, of the hope they had to finde him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyran to winne and corrupt with money, confidering they might commaund their vertue vpon any occasion, without cost vnto them: but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with moin the common wealth. For, faid he, it is more necessarie to stoppe your enemies mouthes, and to fowe vp their lippes from libertie of speaking: then it is to keepe your frendes from it.

Nabis. Nabis was thortely after very traiteroully flaine by the ÆTOLIANS. Whereupponthe C citie of SPARTA grew to a tumult, and Philopamen straight taking the occasion, went thither with his army, and handeled the matter fo wifely: that partely for loue, and partely by force, he wanne the city, &iovned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruelously commended and effeemed of the ACHALANS for this notable victory, to have wonne their tribe and communalty so famous a city, and of so great estimacion. For the city of Spartawasm

Nabis house and goodes were solde, as forfitted to the state: they resolved in their counsellw make him a present of the money therof, which amounted to the summe of fixe score talents, D and fent Ambassadors purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopæmen shewed himselfe plainely to be no counterfeate honest man, but a good man in deede. For first of all, there was free from couetoulnes. not one of all the LACED EMONIANS that durft prefume to offer him this money, but every man was afrayed to tell him of it: and enery body that was appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for them selves. Notwithstandinge, in the ende they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar frend, and also his hoste. And yet the same Timelaw when he came vnto MEGALIFOLIS, & was lodged & entertained in Philopamenes house, did so much reuerence him for his wife talke and conversation, for his moderate diet, and just dealing with all men: that he fawe there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with money, fo as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, E but founde some other occasion to excuse the cause of his comminge vnto him. And beinge fent vnto him againe the second time, he did euen as much as at the first time. And makinga third proofe, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good will the city of Spart a did beare him. Philopamen became a glad man to heare it : and whenhe had heard all he had to fay to him, he wenthim selfe vnto the citie of Sparta. There he declared vnto the counfell, that it was not honest men, and their good frends, they should seeke nes wife coun-pullant armies one against an other in the middest of GREECE: it was meete for a good Generall and wife gouernor, to have an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the fame, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thinge within his contry at that instant, but then rather to differible it, and not to feeme to heare any fault whatfoeuer they did, Diophanes would Diophanes of R not be perswaded, but entred the territories of LACED E MON with a great army, and Titus T. Quinius Outstills Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towardes the city of Spar-TA. Philopæmen was fo madde with their doings, that he tooke apon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iust: neuerthelesse, his attempt proceeded of a noble minde, and Philopamegreat corage. For he got into the citie of Sparta, and beinge but a private persone, kept out the General of the ACHAIANS, & the Confull of the ROMAINES for entring the city: & when he had pacified all troubles and feditions in the fame, he delivered it vp againe as it was before. into the handes of the communaltie of the ACHAIANS. Neuertheleffe, him felfe being afterwardes Generall of the ACHAIANS, did compell the LACED & MONIANS to receive those Philopame. home agains whom they had banished for certaine faultes, and did put foure score naturall inest cinetity to borne citizens of Sparta vnto death, as Polybius wryteth. Or three hundred and fifty, as Arifourates an other historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and rased them to the grounde, and tooke away the most parte of their territories, and gave them to the MEGAL OPOLITANS. All those whome the tyrannes had made free denizens of Spar-TA, he compelled them to departe the contry of LACED EMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAIA, three thousand only excepted, who would not obey his commaundement: all those he folde for flaues, and with the money he made of them (to fpight them the more) he built a goodly fayer walke within the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACED E-MONTAN'S all the mischiefe he coulde, and as it were, to treade them under the feete in their most grieuous misery : he did a most cruell and vniust acte towarde them. For he compelled Philopamen D them to leaue the discipline and maner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of made the oldetime instituted: and made them to follow the maner the A CHATAN SVEEd, in liew of their fake Lycanyua olde grounded contry custome, bicause he sawe they would neuer be humble minded so long as they kept Lyourges order and inflitucion. Thus were they driven to put the heades in the choller, by the milerable milhappe that befell them: and in all despight, to suffer Philopemen in this maner to cut a funder (as it were) the finewes of their common wealth. But afterwardes they made fute to the ROMAINES, that they might be fuffered to enjoy their auncient discipline againe, which being graunted them, they straight left the maner of the Achaians and did fet vp againe as much as was possible (after so great miserie and corruption of their maners) their olde auncient customes and orders of their contry, Now about the time the warres begannein GREECE, betwene the ROMAINES and king Antiochus, Philopamen was then a prinate man, and without any authority. He feeinge that kinge Antiochus lay still in the citie of Antiochus fo-Chalcis, and did nothing but feaft and loue, and had maried a younge maide farre ynmeete lace and mafor his yeres: and perceiuing that his Syrian fouldiers wandered up and downe the townes in ... ingreat disorder, playing many lewde partes without guide of Captaines: he was very fory he was not at that time Generall of the ACHATANS, and tolde the ROMATNES, that he envied Philopametheir victory, having warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For (favd he) if ner counted fortune fauored me that I were Generall of the ACHAIANS at this present, I woulde have kil-Romaines. led them enery man in the cellers and tippling houses. Now when the ROMAINES had ouercome Antiochus, they beganne to haue furer footing in GREECE: and to compaffe in the A-CHAIANS of all fides, and specially, by reason the heades and gouernors of the cities about them did yeelde to the ROMAINES, to winne their fauor. And now their greatnesse grewe in halt, by the fauor of the goddes, so as they were become the monarche of the whole worlde, who brought them nowe to the ende that fortune had determined. Philopamen in the means A time did like a good pylot, bare hard against the billowes and roughnesse of their waves; and though for the time he was forced to give place, and to let things passe, yet for all that he was against the ROMAINES, and did withstande them in the most parte of their proceedinges, by feeking euer to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquence & well doing caried great authority among the ACHAIANS. And when Ariftanetus MEGALOPOLITAN, (a man of great authority among the ACHAIANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES fayd in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they should deny the ROMAINES nothinge. nor shew them selues ynthankefull to them: Philopamen hearing what he sayd, held his peace a while, and fuffered him to speake (though it boyled in his hart, he was so angry with him) and in the ende, breaking all pacience, and as one ouercome with choller, he fayd. O Ariffe h netwo, why have you such hast to see the vnfortunate ende of GREECE? An other time, when Manius, Consult of Rome (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the counsell of the A CHAIANS, that such as were banished from LACED EMON, might returne home into their contry againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnestly intrease them: Philopamen was against it not for any hatred he bare vnto the banished men, but bicante he would have done it by his owne meane, and the only grace of the ACHAIANS, to the ende they shuld not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the Romaines. Afterwardes he him felfe, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did restore them wholly to their owneagaine. Thus was Philopæmen formtime, a litle to bolde and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomake: and specially when any man of authority sought for to haue thinges. Lastely, C beinge three score and tenne yeares of age, he was the eight time chosen Generall of the A. CHAIANS, and hoped well, not only to passe the yeare of his chrage in peace and quietnes, but also all the rest of his life without any sturre of new warres, he saw the affaires of GREBCE take fo good fuccesse. For like as the force & strength of sickenes declineth, as the natural strength of the fickely body empaireth: fo through all the cities and people of GREECE, enuy of quarrell and warres surceased, as their power diminished. Neuerthelesse, in the end of his years gouernment, the goddes divine (who iustly punish all infolent wordes and deedes) threw him to the grounde, as they fuffer a ryder vnfortunately to take a fall of his horse, beinge comeamost to the ende of his cariere. For they wryte, that he beinge in a place on a time amonget good companie, where one was maruelously praised for a good Captaine, sayed vnto them: D why, mafters, can ye commende him that was contented to be taken prisoner aliue of his enemies? Shortely after came newes that Dinocrates MESSENIAN (a private enemy of Philopemenes for certaine controuerfies past between them, and a man generally hated besides, of all honorable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawen the city of MES-SINA from the deuotion of the ACHAIANS: and moreouer that he came with an army to take a towne called Colonide. Philopamen was at that time in the city of Argos, ficke of an agew, and yet hearing these newes, tooke his iorney toward MEGALIPOLIS, making al the hast he could possible, so that he came aboue soure hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at arms of the lustiest and wealthiest MEGALOPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of theci-E ty, and willingly offered them felues to goe with him for the goodwill they bare him, and for the defire they had to follow his valliantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of Mont Euan- MESSINA, and marched so longe, that they came nere vnto the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates & his copany, & gaue so fierce an onset on them, that they made themal turne taile: how beit in the meane while, there came a reliefe of fine hudred men to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the contry of MESSINA. The flying menthat were scattered here & there, feeing this supply, gathered them selues againe together, and shewed vpon the hills. Philopamen fearinge to be enuironned, and being desirous to bring his men safe home again, who most of loue had followed him: beganne to marche away through narrow bushy places, him felfe being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes upon his enemies, & skirmifhed with F them, onely to drive them away from followinge of the rest of his company, and not a man that durft once fet apon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him.

Howebeit Philopamen fundry times venturinge farre from his company, to gene these young noble men leafure to faue them selues one after an other: tooke no heede to him selfe that he was alone, enuironned on euery side with a great number of ennemies. Notwithstandinge, of all his enemies there was not a man that durft come to hande strokes with him, but still slinging and shooting at him a farre of, they draue him in the end amongest stony places between hewen rockes, where he had much a doe to guide his horse, although he had spurred him that he was all of a gore blood. And as for his age, that did not lette him but he might have faued him selfe, for he was strong and lusty by the continuall exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe, his body being weake with fickenes, and weary with the long iorney he had made that dav, he founde him felfe very heavy and ill disposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threwe him to the grounde. His fall was very great, and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the Thilopene place a great while, and neuer sturred nor spake: so that his enemies thinkinge he had bene numberdead, came to turne his body to strippe him. But when they saw him lift vp his head and open Philippanen his eves, then many of them fell all at once apon him, and tooke him, and bounde both his saken. hands behinde him, and did all the villany and mischiese they could vnto him, and sitch, as one would little haue thought Dinocrates would haue vied in that forte, or that he could haue had suchan ill thought towardes him. So, they that taried behinde in the city of MESSINA, were maruelous glad when they heard these newes, and ranne all to the gates of the city to see him brought in. When they faw him thus shamefully bounde, and pinnioned, against the dignity of somany honors as he had received, and of so many triumplies and victories as he had pased: the most parte of them wept for pitie, to consider the mishappe and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so little certainety, as in maner it is nothing. Then beganne there some curreous speeche to runne in the mouthes of the people by litle and litle, that they should remember the great good he had done vnto them in times past, and the liberty he had restored them vnto, when he expulsed the tyran Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other against (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, sayed they should hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a daungerous enemy, and that would neuer forgive man that had once offendedhim: and the rather, bicause he would be more terrible to Dinocrates, then ever he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiving such open shame by him. Nevertheles, in the end they caried him into a certen dungeon under the ground, called the treasury, (which had neither D light nor aver at all into it, nor dore, nor half dore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these younge noble ACHAIAN horsemen had fled vppon the spurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred them selues, & looked round about for Philopamen: & finding him not in fight, they supposed straight hehad bene slaine. Thereuppon they stayed a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he aunswered not, they beganne to say among them selues, they were bealtes and cowardes to flie in that forte: and how they were dishonored for euer so to haue for saken their. Captaine, to faue themselues, who had not spared his owne life, to deliuer them from daunger. Hereupon ryding on their way, and enquiring still for him: they were in the end adjectiledhow he was taken. And then they went & caried those newes through all the townes and cities of Achara, which were very fory for him, and tooke it as a figne of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to fend Ambaffadors forthwith to the MESSENIANS, to demaunde him : and in the meane time every man should prepare to arme them selves, to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the Achalan's had thus fent, Dinocrates, feared nothing fo much, as that delay of time might faile Philopemenes life : wherefore to preuent it, as foone as night came, and that the people were at reft, he straight canfed the stone to. berolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopemen with a cuppe of poison to offer him, who was commaunded also not to goe from him, vntill he had dronke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopamen layed on Philopamen the grounde apon a litle cloke, having eno lift to fleepe; he was fo grievously troubled in his postned by minde. Who when he sawe light, and the man standing by him, holding a cuppe in his hande Dimocrate. with this poison, he sate vpright vpon his cowch, how beit with great paine he was so weake:

that came with him, and specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them were faued. Then he cast his handes a litle ouer his head, and looking merely on him he fayd: it is well, seeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith speaking no moe wordes, nor makinge other a doe, he droncke vp all the poison, and layed him downe as before. So nature straue not much withall, his body being brought so lowe, and thereupon the poison wrough his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The newes of his death ran presently through all Achara, which generally from high to low was lamented. Whereupon all the Achara youth and counsellors of their cities and townes, affembled them selues in the city of Maga-LIPOLIS, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas there Generall, vnder whose conduct they inuaded the MESSENIANS, with force and violence, R puttinge all to the fire and fword : fo as the MESSENIANS were fo feared with this mercileffe fury, that they yelded them felues, and wholly confented to receive the ACHAIANS into their city. But Dinocrates would not give them leafure to execute him by inflice, for he killed him flue him felfe. felfe: and fo did all the rest make themselves away, who gave advise that Philopamen should be put to death. But those that would have had Philopamen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused the to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with all kind of tormets. That done, the burnt Philopamenes body, and did put his ashes into a pot. Then they straight departed from MESSINA, not in disorder, one apon an others necke as every man listed : but in such an order and ray, that in the middest of these funeralles they did make a triumphe of victorie. For the fouldiers were all crowned with garlandes of lawrell in token of victory, notwithstanding, the C teares ranne downe their cheekes intoken of sorowe, and they led their enemies prisoners, shackled and chained. The funerall pot in the which were Philopamenes ashes, was so covered with garlandes of flowers, no legaies, and laces, that it could feart be feene or difference, and was carried by one Polybius a young man, the sonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the Achaians: about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefest of the Achaians and after them also followed all the souldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so forowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which have great cause of sorow; nor yet so joyful, as those that came conquerers from so great a victory. Those of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they past, came and presented them selves vinto them, to touche the funerall pot of his ashes, euen as they were wont to take him bythe] hande, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALIPOLIS. At the gates whereof, were olde men, women, and children, which thrustinge them selues amongest the souldiers, did renewe the teares, to rowes, and lamentacions of all the miferable and vnfortunate city: who tooke it that they had lost with their citizen, the first and chiefest place of honor among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of MESSINA, were all stoned to death, about his sepulchre. All the other cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honors they did vnto him, did fet vp flatues, and as like to him, as could be counterfeated. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GREECE, when the city of CORINTHE was burnt and destroied by the ROMAINES, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did what he could to hauethe fame pulled downe againe, by burdening & accufing Philopemen (as if he had bene aliue) that he was alwaies enemy to the ROMAINES, and enuied much their prosperity and victories, But after Polybius had aunswered him: neither the Conful Mummius, nor his counsellers, nor liesttenaunts, would fuffer them to deface & take away the honors done in memory of fo famous & worthy a ma, although he had many waies done much hurtvnto Titus Quintius Flaminius & vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a differece between duery & profit: & did thinks numents from honesty & profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason and inflice. Moreoner they were perswaded, that like as men receive curtesie and goodnessel any so are they bound to requite them againe, with kindenes and duety. And as men vie to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honor and reuerence vertue. And thus much soft the life of Philoparmen. The ende of Philopamenes life. อด้วย พ.ศ. วิจากอดีต จักสาคาจ

THE LIFE Titus Quintius Flaminius.

T is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme, and stature, by Philo-I pamenes statue of brasse, to whome we compare him : the which is now fet vppe at Rome, neere to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the comming in to the show place, under which there is an inscription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they fay of him thus: he would quickely be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men againe. For, if he did punish any man that had angered him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continew with him. He did good allo to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleafured, as if they had done him some pleafure: & was ready to do for them still whom he founde thankefull, bicause he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honorable a thinge, as he could purchase to him selfe. Bicause he greatly fought honor about all thinges, when any notable feruice was to be done, he would dont him felfe, and no man thould take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with those that could helpe him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercise his vertue with: the other, he tooke them as his fellowes and followers of honor with him. He came to mans state, when the citie of Rome had greatest warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of Rome, which were of age to cary weapon, were fent to the warres to learne to traile the pyke, and how to become good Captaines. Thus was he cutred into marshall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Time Quin. C Hannibell of CARTHAGE, where the was made Colonell of a thousande footemen, under Mar- www single cellus the confull: who being flaine by an ambitth Hanniball had tayed for him between the cities of BANGTA, and VENVEA, then they did choose Titus Quintius Flaminius gouetnor of the prouince and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the seconde time. In this gouernment of his, he wanne the reputacion as much of a good and just man, as he did of an expert and skilfull Captaine. By reason whereof, when the Romathes were requested to send men to inhabite the cities of NARNIA & Cossa, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other younge men were wont to attaine the Consulshippe. Therefore when the time came that the Consulls should be elected, he did present him selfe amonge other, accompanied with a great number of those he hadde brought with him, to inhabite the two newe towners who did make earnest sute for him. But the two Tribunes Fuluius, and Manlius, spakes gainst him, and sayed: it was out of all reason, that so youngea man should in such manner prease to have the office of the highest dignitie, against the vie and custome of Rome, before he hadde passed through the inferior offices of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, the Se nate preferred it wholly to the voyces of the people: who prefently pronounced him Con. full openly, with Sextim AElim, although he was not yet thirtie yeare olde. Afterwardes MElius and he deuidinge the offices of the state by lotte : it fell apon T. Quintius to make n nius, Sexuius warre with Philip kinge of MACEDON. In the which me thinkes fortune greatly fauored the ROMAINES affaires, that made such a man Generall of these warres : for, to have pointed Generall that by force and violence woulde have fought all thinges at the MACED ONLANS handes, that were a people to be wonne rather by gentlenesse and perswasions, then by some & compulsion: it was all against them selves. Philip, to maintaine the bront of a battell against the ROMAINES, had power enough of his owne in his realme of MACEDON: but to make warre any long time, to furnish him selfe with money and vittailes, to have a place and cities to retyre vnto, and lastly, to have all other necessaries for his men and army: it stoode himapon to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE bene politickely cut from him, the warres against him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreouer, GREECE (which (neuer before bare the ROMAINES any great good will) would not have delethen fo inwardly in frendthippe with them, had not their Generall bene (as he was) a gentle persone, lowly, and tractable, that wanne them more by his wisedome, then by his force, & could both eloquently vtter his minde to them, and curteoufly also heare them speake, that had to doe with him. and chiefely, ministred instice and equity to enery manalike. For it is not to be thought that GREECE would otherwise so some have withdrawen them selves from the rule of those, with whome they were acquainted, and gouerned: and have put them selves vinder the rule of straungers, but that they saw great instice and lenity in them. How beit that may more plainly appeare, by declaring of his actes. Titus was informed, that the Generalls before him fento the warre in Macedon (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vied to come thither about the later D end of the yeare, and made but cold warres, and certaine light skirmifhes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in an other against Philip, and all to take some straite, or to cut of vittells: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarying at home, confumed the most of their Consulshippe at Rome, in matters of gouernment, and so enjoyed the honor of their office. Afterwardes in the end of their yeare, they would fet out to the wares, of intent to get an other yeare ouer their heades in their office, that spending one yere in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the warres abroade. But Titus not minding to trifle out the halfe of his Consulfhippe at Rome, and the other abroade in the warres did willingly leaue all his honors and dignities he might have enjoyed by his office at Rome, and befought the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenant of E their army by fea. Furthermore, he tooke with him felfe about three thousandeolde souldiers of those that had first ouerthrowen Asdrubal in Spayne, & Hannibal afterwardes in Africa, under the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to ferue, and were very willinge to goewith him in this iorney, to be the strength of his army. With this companie he passed the seas T. Q. Londed without daunger, and landed in EPIRVs, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his atmy before kinge Philip, who of longe time had lien in campe about the mouth of the river of Apfus, to kepe the straight and passage which is the entry into E PIRVS. So that Publius Iulius had lienstill there, and done nothing, by reason of the naturall force and hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, and fent him to Rome. Afterwards, him felfe went in perfone to view and confider the nature of the contry, which was in this forte. T. Q. FLAMINIVS. A nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had: but it was a great deepe marrishe or mianemyre, through the iniddest whereof the riner called Apfus did runne, being in greatnes and swiftnes of streame, very like to the river of Peneus. The river did occupie all the ground arthe feete of the mountaines, fauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow straight pathe by the waters side, very vnhandesome for an army to passe that way, though they found not a man to keepe the passage. There were some in the army that counselled Titus to fetche a great compasse about by the contry of DASSARET IDE, and by the city of Lynevs, where the contry is very plaine, and the way maruelous easie. Howebeit he floode in great feare he should lacke vittells, if he stayed farre from the sea, and happely if he fell into any barren or leane contry, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should he constrained in the end to returne againe towardes the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the mountaines to ser your his enemy, and to proue if he could winnethe paffage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the ROMAINES forced to get up the hilles, they were receiued with dartes, slings, and shot, that lighted amongest them here & there insomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slavne and hurt on either side. But this was not the ende of the warre. For in the meane time there came certaine neateherdes of the contry vnto Titus (who did vie to keepe beaftes on these mountaines) and tolde him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not by the which they promifed to guide his army fo, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bringe them on the top of the mountaine. And bicause they might be affured that their wordes were true, they sayed they were lent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Caropus was the chiefest man of the Charopus. EPIROTS, who loued the ROMAINES very well, yet he fauored them but vnder hand, for feare (Machanus of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his Captaines with them, with source shirts man thousand sootemen, and three hundred horsemen. The heard men that were their guides, went of the Epirata before still, fast bounde; and the ROMAINES followed after. All the day time the army rested in thicke wooddes, and marched all night by moone light, which was then by good happe at the ful. Titus having fentthese men away, rested all the rest of his campe: saning that some daies he entertayned them with some light skirmishes to occupy the enemy withall. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compaffe about, shoulde come vnto the top of the mountaine abouethe campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, &c deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he himselse went on that side of the riuer where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hil. The MACED ONIANS againe, they shot lustely at them from the height of the hill, and in certenplaces amongest the rockes they came to the sworde. At the selfe same time, the two other troupes on either hande of him did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hill, and as it were enuying one an other, they climed vo with great corage against the sharpe and steepe hanginge of the mountaine. When the funne was vp, they might fee a farre of as it were a certen fmoke, T. The enemies could fee nothing, bicaufe it was behinde them, & that the top the mountaines. of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The ROMAINES, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the middest of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they faw it increased stil more, & more, & in such sorte, that it darkened all the ayer: then they did affure them selues it was certainely the token their men did give them that they were come. Then they beganne to crie out, clyminge vp the hills with fuch a lufly corage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill still, even vnto the very rough and hardest places of the mountaine. tells were very scant with the at that time, yet they neuer tooke any thing of the cotry, though they founde great store & plenty of all riches in it. For Titus was advertised, that Philip passing Philips flying by THESSALIE, and flying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to fet fire on their houses, & to leave those goodes they could not carva.

way, by reason of the weight & vnhandsome carriage therof, to the spoyle of his souldiers: & so (as it feemed)he left the whole contry to the conquest of the ROMAINES, Whereuppon Titus looking colideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the contry with footening for the court doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they taried not long to enjoy the benefit of their orderly and wife forbearing of the contry. For fo foone as they were entred THESSALIE, the cities willingly yeelded them felnes VII to them: & the GREECIANS inhabiting beyond the contry of THERM OPYLES, did marile. loufly defire to fee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put them felues into his hands. The A. CHAIANS also on the other side, did renouce the league & alliance they had made with Philine and furthermore did determine in their counsell, to make warre with him on the Romaines fide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time frendes and confederates with the Ro. MAINES, & that they did show the selues very louing to take their parte in these warres nevertheles when they defired the OPVNTIANS that they would put their city into their hands and were offred that it should be kept & defended fro Philip: they would not harke therto but few for Titus, & put the felues & their goods wholly into his protection. They fay, that when kine Prerus first faw the ROMAINES army range in order of battel from the top of a hill, he faidthis c order of the barbarous people, setting of their men in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous maner. And those also that neuer had seene Titus before, & came for to speake with him:were gaine. Then it much more appeared, when Philip (hewed him felfe willing to have peace, and I) that Titus also did offer it him, and the frendthippe of the people of ROME, with these conditions: that he would leave the GREECIANS their whole liberties, & remove his garrifons out of their cities and strong holdes: which Philip refused to do. And thereupon all GREECE, and euen those which fauored Philip, sayed with one voyce: that the ROMAINES were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauor of the GREECIANS.

Wherupon all GREECE came in, & offred them felues vnto Titus without copulfion. And as he passed through the contry of BOE OTIA, without any shew at all of warres, the chiefest meet the city of THEBES wetto mete him: who though they tooke part with the king of MACEDON bicause of a private ma called Brachylelis, yet they would honor Titus, as those which were cotented to keepe league & frendship with either side. Titus embraced them, & spake very cuite E oufly vnto the, going on his way stil faver & fostly, entertaining the sometime with one matter, & somtime with an other, & kept them talke of purpose, to the end his souldiers being weared with iornying, might in the meane time take good breath: & so marching on, by litle & litle, he entred into the city with the. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleased, but yet they durst not refuse him, though he had not at that time any nuber of souldiers about him. Whe he was within THEBES, he praied audiece, & began to perswade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already) that they woulde rather take parte with the ROMAINES. King Audus then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpose, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the affembly, did help to exhort the THEBANS very earnestly, that they would doe as Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeares, F for the defire he had (as was imagined) to shewe Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and moue him felfe withall, that he founded fodaynely in the middest of his oration, whereby the

A rewme fell downe fo fast vppon him, that it tooke away his sences, so as he fell in a traunse before them all, and few dayes after was conceyed againe by fea into Asia, where he lived not log after. In the meane time, the BOEOTIANS came into the ROMAINES, & tooke their parte. The Basilans And Philip having fent Ambassadors to Rome, Titus also sent thither of his men to solicite for yeld winto the him, in two respects. The one, if the warres continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious did feare least they would fend a successor to continew those warres, who should take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his frends made such earnest sute for him, that neither king I hilip attained that he prayed: neither was there fent any other generall in Titus place, but he still continued his charge in these warres. Wherfore, so soone as he had received his comission & authority from the Senate, he went straight towards THESSALIB, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army aboue fix & twenty thousand fighting men, Onimite arwhereof the ATOLIANS made fix thousand footemen, and three thousande horsemen. King my philips army on thother fide was no leffe in number, & they began to march one towards the other wntill at the length they both drew neere the city of Scotus, where they determined King Philip to try the battell. So, neither they nor their men were afraid, to see them selves one so neere an and Quinina other: but rather to the contrary, the Romains on the one fide tooke greater hart & corage mensuch their vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselves what great honor they should win to Scoula. ouercome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valliantnes, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other fide also, taking the ROMAINES for other maner of souldiers then the PERSIANS, began to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make king Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus the calling his men together, spake, & exhorted the tofland to it like men, & to flow the felues valliant fouldiers in this battel, as those which were

when the proofe of their valliantnesse in the hart of GREECE the goodliest Theater of the world & against their enemies of most noble same. Philip then by chaunce, or forced to it by thespede he made, bicause they were both ready to ity ne; did get yp ynwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being while hill raised up about the rest, & neere the trenches of his campe) and there began to encorage his foundiers, as all generals do before D they give battel. Who when he faw them all discoraged, for they tooke it for an il signe that he was gotten up on the top of a graue to speake unto them: he of a conceite at the matter, did of himselfe deferre to give battell that day. The next morning bicause the night was very wet by reason the sowthewindes had blowen, the clowds were turned to a miste, & filled all the valley with a darke groffe thicke ayer coming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field between both campes with a mift all the morning by reason wherof the skowtes on both sides that were sent to discouer what the enemies did, in very shorte time met together, & one gaue charge upon an other in a place they call the dogges heads, which are pointes of rockes placed upon litle hills one before an other, and very nere one voto an other, which have bene called to, bicaute they have had fome likenes of it. Then the ATOLIANS (that were the common flaunderers of Titus proceedinges) beganne openly to make these cities to rebell, and did summone Titus to loose the chaines of chalide.Co-GREECE: for fo did kinge Philip call these three cities. Then they asked the GREECIANS in rinthe, De-Meriade, calmockery, whether they were willing now to have heavier fetters on their legges, then before, the by Philip

Then all the people that had taken their places, & were fet to fee the Swordplaces play, rose vp all on their feete, lettinge the games alone, and went together with greation to falute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was seene (which is much spoken of) the power of mens voyces: crowes flying, for crowes fel downe at that prefent time among the people, which by chaunce flew ouer the show place at that time that they made the same out showte. This came to passe, by reason the aver was broken and cut a funder, with the vehemency and strength of the voyces, so as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driven of necessis. ty to fall to the grounde, as flyinge through a voide place where they lacked ayer. Vnlesse we a will rather fay, that it was the violence of the crie, which strooke the birdes passinge through the ayer, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and so made them fall downe dead to the earth. It may be also, that there was some hurlinge winde in the ayer, as we doe see sometime in the fea, when it rifeth high, and many times turneth about the waves, by violence of the storme So it is, that if Titus hadde not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to fee him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly scaped from being stifled amongest them, the people came so thicke about him from every place. But after that they were weary of crying, and finging about his pauillion vntill night in the ende they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kinne, frendesor citizens, they did kiffe and embrace one an other for ioy, and fo supped, and made mery together, C In their more rejoycinge yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table. but of the warres of GREECE, discoursing amongest them what fundry great warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they could never fo joyfully nor more affuredly obtaine it, then they did even a that present, receiving the honorablest reward, & that which deserved greatest fame through the worlde: that by the vallianmesse of straungers who fought for the same (without any spik blood of their ownein comparison, or that they lost the life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament) they were so restored to their auncient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thinge amongest men, to finde a man very valliant, and wife withall: but yet of all fortes of valliant men, it is harder to finde a just man. For Agesilaus, Lylander, Nicias, Alcibiades, D and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to lead an army, and to winne the battell, as well by fea as by lande: but to turne their victories to any honorable benefit, or true honor among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you doe except thebattell against the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iorney of PLATEES, the battell of THERMOPYLES, the battell Cimon fought about CIPRVS, and upon the river of Eurymedon: all the other warres & battels of GREECE that were made, fell our against them selves, and did euer bringe them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumphe which euer were fet vp for the fame, was to their shame and losse. So that in the end, GREECE was veterly deltroyed and ouerthrowen, and that chiefly through the wickednes and felfe will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying an others doing. Where a E straunge nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to moue them to doit (for that they have had no great familiarity with auncient GREECE, & through the counsel & good wifedome of the which it should seemevery straunge that GREECE coulde receive any benefit) haue notwithstanding with daungerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppression, and seruitude, of violent Lordes and tyrans. This, and such like talke, did at that time occupy the GREECIANS heades: and moreover, the deedes following did aunswer and performe the words of the proclamatio. For at one selfe time, Titus sent Lentulus into A $1,4,00 fet the BARGYLIAMS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garrifons out of the lles & cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was sent also into Asia, vnto king Quintinueare Antiochus, to speake vnto him to set the GREECIANS at liberty which he kept in subjection. F And as for Titus, he went him selfe vnto the city of CHALCIDE, where he tooke sea, and went into the prouince of Magnesia, out of the which he tooke all the garrifons of the cities, and redeliuered

A redelivered the government of the common wealth vnto the citizes of the same. Afterwards when time came, that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of Argos in the honor The feet of Hercules, Titus was chosen judge, & rector of the games that were plaied there: where, after Nemea keps he had fet all thinges in very good order, pertaining vnto the folemnity of the feast, he caused at Argon. againe solemne proclamation to be made openly, for the generall liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore, visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed instice, and did set the inhabitants and citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amity, and concord one with an other; and did call home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, and pacified all oldequarrells and diffentions amonge them. The which did no leffe please and content him. that by perswasions he could bring the GREBCIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then a fhe had by force of armes ouercome the MACED ONLANS. Infomuch, as the recouery of the libertie which Titus had restored vnto the GREECIANS, seemed vnto them the least parte of the goodnesse they had received at his handes. They say, that Lycurgus the orator seeinge the Lycurgus the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment orator, refund ofacertaine imposition, which the straungers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to the Philoso pay: he rescued him from them by force, and moreouer prosecuted law so hard against them, pher, or sand that he made them pay a fyne for the iniury they had done vnto fo worthy a person. And they for tell, how the same Philosopher afterwardes meeting Lyeurgus children in the city, sayed vnto them. I doe wel requite your fathers good turne he did me: for I am the cause that he is praifedand commended of euery man, for the kindenesse he shewed on my behalfe. So the good C deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintins Flaminius vnto the GREBCIANS, did not onbyreapethis benefit vnto them, in recompence that they were praifed and honored of all the worlde: but they were cause also of increasinge their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the worlde afterwardes had great affiance and trust in them, and that most instly. So that the people and cities did not onely receive the Captaines and governors the Romaines fentthem: but they also went to Roma vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put them selves into their handes. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes allo(which were oppressed by other more mighty than them selues) had no other refuge, but to put them selues vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very shorte time (with the fauor and helpe of the goddes as I am perswaded) all the world came to submit them selues to D their obedience, and vinder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more, that he hadrestored GREECE agains vinto liberty, then in any other seruice or exployte he had euer done. For when he offered up vnto the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, the targets offilter with his owne shielde, he made these verses to be grauen vpon them, in effect as fol-

So hath the city of CORINTHE enjoyed this good happe, that the GREECIANS have bene twife proclaimed to be fet at liberty: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time, by Nero in our time, and at the felfe fame instant when they folemnly kept the feast called Isthmia. Howebeit the first proclamation of their liberty (as we have tolde ye before) was done by the voyce of a herauld: and the seconde time it was done by Nero him selfe, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open affembly, in the market place of the city of CORINTHE. But it was a longe time after. Furthermore, Titus beganne then a goodly and full warre against Nabis, the curfed and wicked tyran of LACED & MON. Howebeit in the ende he deceaued the expectation of GREECE. For when he might have taken him, he would n not doe it, but made peace with him, for fakinge poore Spart a vnworthily oppreffed vnder VVhy Quinthe yoke of bondage: either bicause he was afrayed that if the warre helde on, there shoulde come a fucceffor vnto him from ROME, that should cary the glory away to ende the same; or elfe he stoode Iealous and envious of the honor they did vnto Philopamen. Who having the wed him felfe in enery place as excellent a Captaine as ener came in GREECE, and havinge done notable actes and famous feruice, both of great wifedome, and also of valliantnesse, and specially in the A CHAIANS warre: he was as much honored & reverenced of the ACHAIANS. in the Theaters and common affemblies, even as Titus was. Whereat Titus was marveloully offended, for he thought it vnreasonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene generallof an army but in small little warres against his neighbours, should be as much esteemed and ho. nored, as a Confull of Rome, that was come to make warres for the recourry of the liberie of GREECE. But Titus alleaged reasonable excuse for his doinges, saying that he saw very well he coulde not destroy this tyran Nabis, without the great losse and misery of the other Spar-TANS. Furthermore, of all the honors the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neere any recompence of his honorable and well deferuing, but one onely present they offered him, and which he aboue all the rest most esteement and this it was. Duringe the seconde warres of Africke, which the Romaines had against Hanniball, many ROMAINES were taken prisoners in the fundry mattells they lost, and beinge folde here and there, remained flaues in many contries: and amongest other, there were di-fperfed in GREECE to the number of twelve hundred, which from time to time did movemen D with pitie and compassion towardes them, that faw them in so miserable chaunge and state of fortune. But then much more was their miserie to be pitied, when these captives found in the

turne into I TALIE: which prefent made him returne home with greater joy and contentacion having received for his noble deedes so honorable a recompence, and worthy of himselfe, B that was fo louing a man to his citizens and contry. And furely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did most beautifie histriumphe. For these poore redeemed captives did that, which the flaues are wont to doe on that day when they be fet at liberty: to witte, they shaue their heades, and doe weare litle hattes apon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and so followed Titus charret, on the day of his triumphe and entrie made into Rome in the triumphing manner. It was a goodly fight alforto fee the spoyles of the enemies, which were caried in the show of this triumphe; as store of helmets after the GREECIANS facion, heapes of targets, shieldes, and pykes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull fumme of gold and filuer. For Itanus the historiographer writeth, that there was brought a maruelous great maffe of treasure in niggots of golde, of three thousand seuen F hundred and thirteene pounde weight, and of filuer, of forty three thousande, two hundred, three score and tenne pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Fhilipsfourea teene thousand, fine hundred, and foureteene, besides the thousand talents king Phills should payfor a raunsome. The which summe, the Romaines afterwardes forgane him, chiefly as Titus fute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a frend and confederate of the people of Rome, and his sonne Demetrius to be sent voto him againe, who remained before as an hoftage at Rome. Shortely after, king Antiochus went out of Asia into Greece with a great fleete of shippes, and a very puisant army, to ftirre vp the cities to forfake their league and allyance with the ROMAINES, and to make a diffention amongest them. To further this his desire and enterprise, the ETOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and secrete malice against the Romaines, and desiredmuch to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to say, that the warre which he tooke in hande, was to fet the GREECIANS at liberty, whereof they had no neede, bicause they did already enjoy their liberty: but for that they had no just cause to make warre. they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he coulde. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearinge greatly the rifing of the people, & the rumor of the power of this great king, they fent thither Manius Scilius their generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenaunts for the GREECIANS fakes. Manius Act-Which arrivall did the more affure them that already bare good will to the Romaines, after hun Conful, or they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that beganne to slie out, and to shrinke T. Cofthem) that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the Ætolians: and though hehad iuft cause of offence towardes them, yet he saued them after the battell. For king In-tischus being ouercome in the contry of THERM OPYLES, fled his way, and in great haft tooke the sea to returne into Asia. And the Consult Manius following his victory, entred into the westloom in contry of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a Thermopyles, pray vnto kinge Philip. So Philip kinge of Macedon on the one fide, spoyled and sacked the the Conful. DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMANIANS, and the APBRANTINES: and the Confull Manius on the other fide, destroyed the city of HERACLEA, and layed siege to the citie of NAVPACIVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus takinge compassion of them, to see

Philip to vsurpe the benefit and reward of his honorable victory, still conqueringe many people, kings, and contries, whileft he continued fiege before a city, and only to wreake his anger voonthem. Afterwardes, when they that were befreged faw Titus from their walles, they calledhim by his name, and helde up their handes unto him, prayinge him he would take pitie vpon them : but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them; he fell a weeping. Afterwards he spake with Manius, and appealing his anger, got him to graunt the ATOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might fende Ambassadors to Roue, to see if they could obtain grace and pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and require for difficulty he had, was to intreate for the Chalcadians, withwhome the Confull (Manies the Mentital was more grieuously offended, then with all the rest: bicause that kinge Antiochus after the warres was begonne, had maried his wife in their cirie, when he was past yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very olde, and beinge in his extreame age, and in the King Antiomiddeft of his warres, he fell in dotage with a young gentlewome, the daughter of Cleoptoleones, Chaptalenus the fayrest woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHAICADIAN swert daughter in much affected unto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his handes, to ferue hien in this the city of warre, for a strong & safe retyring place. Wherupo, whe Antiochus had lost the barrelibe came thither with all possible speede, and takinge from thence with him his passinge faver younge that in the ende, he gotte him to pardone them of CHALCIDE also. Who, bicause they were preserved from perill by his meanes, they to recompence this fact of his, did consecrate vitto him, all their most stately and sumptuous buildinges and common workes in their citie, as an peareth yet by the superscriptions remaininge to be seene at this day. As in the show place of exercises: The people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this show place of exercises, vnto Time vmoT. Quin- Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: The people of CHALCIDE did confectate thus for faming this temple, vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this present time, there is a priest chosen by the voyce of the people, purposely to do facrifice vnto Titus: in which facrifice, after that the thing facrificed is offered vp, and wine powred aponit, the people standing by, do fing a fong of triumphe made in praise of him. But bicause it were to long to wryte it all out, we have only drawen in briefe the latter end of the same: and this it is. The cleare unspotted faith, of Romaines uve adore,

And vovv to be their faithfull frendes, both novv and euer more. Sing out you Muses nyne, to Ioues eternall fame, Sing out the honor due to Rome, and Titus worthy name. Sing out (I (ay) the praise, of Titus and his faith:

By wwhom you have preserved bene, from ruine, dole, and death. Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone only honor & reverence Titus, but he was generally Quanting com. honored also by the GREECIANS as he deserved, &was marvelously beloved for his current refie and good and good nature: which argueth plainely that they did not fainedly honor him, orthrough compulsion, but even from the hart. For though there was some iarre betwixt him and Phi-C Emulation lopamen at the first about service, for emulation of honor, and after betwixt him and Diophahemist T. nes also, both generalls of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare them any malice in his hart, ne-Quintitu and Philopamen. ther did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heate of his wordes, in counsell and assemblies, where he vittered his minde franckely to them both,

Therefore none thought him ener a cruell man, or eger of reuenge: but many haue thought him rathe, and hasty of nature. Otherwise, he was as good a companion in company as postbly could be, and would vie as pleafaunt wife mirthe as any man. As when he fayed to the A-CHAIANS, on a time, who would needes unjustly usurpe the Ile of the ZACYNTHIANS, to diffivade them from it: my Lordes of Achaia, if ye once goe out of Peloponnes vs, you put your felues in daunger, as the torteyfes doe, when they thrust their heades out of their shell. I And the first time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: when Philip said vnto him, you have brought many men with you, and I am come alone. In deede it is true you are alone, faydhe, bicaule you made all your frendes and kinne to be flaine. An other time, Dinocrates MESSI-NIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cuppes in a feast where he was, he disguised him felfe in womans apparell, and daunced in that manner: and the next day followinge he went vnto This; to pray him to helpe him through with his fute, which was, to make the cities MESSINA to rebell, and leave the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him aunswer, that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (fayd he) howe you can daunce in womans apparell, and finge at a feast, havinge such matters of weight in your head. In the counsel of the A CHAIANS, king Antiochus ambaffadors beinge come thither, to moue them to break ! their league with the ROMAINES, and to make alliance with the king their mafter, they made a maruelous large discourse of the great multitude of souldiers that were in their masters ar-

Furthermore, after Tirus had done these thinges, and that the warre with Antiochus was ended, he was chosen Censor at Rome, with the sonne of that same Marcellas,

A who had benefiue times Confull. This office is of great dignities, and as a man may fave the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of Rome can have in their common wealth: They pur of the Senate, foure men only; but they were not famous. They did receive all imo the numher of citizens of Rome, that would present them selves to be enrolled in their cismimon regester : with a prouiso, that they were borne free by father and mother. They were compelled to doe it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despight the nobility, perswaded the Deople of Rome to commaunde it fo. Nowe at that time, two of the noblest and most fa-molismen of Rome were great enemies one against an other: Publius Scipio African, and P. Schio and Marcus Porcius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the M.P. Cato Senate as the chiefest and worthiest persone in the citie : and got the displeasure of the other, great enemies, which was Cato, by this mithappe. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, no- Secret groups bearing Time thing like vnto him in condition at all: for he was fo dissolutely and licentiously given over to and caid. his pleasure, that he forgatte all comlinesse and honesty. This Lucius loued well avourge boy. and caried him alwayes with him when he went to the warres, or to the charge and gouernment of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day fayd vnto Lucius Quintius; that he loued him so well, that he did leave the sight of the Swordplayers at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer seene man killed before: to waite you him. Tuins being very glad of the boyes wordes, aunswered him straight, thou shalt loose nothing for that my boy, for I will by & by please thee as well. So he commaunded a condemned man A cried dide tobe fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whome he willed to strike of of their Chishead in the middest of his supper, that the boy might see him killed, Valerius Antias the hiforiographer wryteth, thatit was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Livius declareth, that in an oration which Cato him selfe made, it was wrytten, that itwas one of the GAV LES: who beinge a traitor to his contry men, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his halle killed him with his owne handes, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howebeitit is very likely that Cato wrote in this forte, to aggravate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many haue wrytten it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offendor condemned to dye: and amonge other, Cicero the orator doth recite it in a booke he made of age, where he made it to be tolde vnto Catoes owne persone. Howesoeuer it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and clensing the Senate of all vnworthy persones, he put of the same Cato being Luius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bene Confull: which disgrace did seeme to re- cenfor did pur downeto his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius also. Whereupon both the brethren came we- Lucius Quinping with all humility before the people, and made a petition that feemed very reasonable & ut of the St-cuill: which was that they would commaunde Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly why he had with fuch open shame defaced so noble a house as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking backe, came with his companion into the market place, where he asked Titus out alowde, if he knew nothing of the supper where such a fact was committed.

ther, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by T. Quimius practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leases, and all deedes of sales made by Catoduring his office, were called in, and made voyde: and caused many sures also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I can not say he did wisely or civilly, to become mortall enemy to an honest man, a good citizen, and duetifull in his office, for his yeare, but vnworthy kinfeman, who had justly deserved the shame layed voon him. Notwithstanding, shortely after when the people were affembled in the Theater to fee games played, & the Senators were ftraccording to their custome, in the most honorable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble maner went to fit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honor: which when the people faw, they tooke pity of him, & could

Titus aunswered, he knewe not of it. Then Cato opened all the whole matter as it was, and in the ende of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would deny that he had sayed wastrue. Lucius aunswered not a worde. Whereuppon the people judged the shame was iufly layed vpon him : and fo to honor Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for ora-

tim reftored to his place by T. Quintius

Lucius Quin. not abide to see him thus dishonored. So they cried out to have him come and fit among the other Senators the Confulls, who made him place, and received him accordingly. But tope. turne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition & couetous greedy minde he had of honor, was very well taken and esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the warres, which we have spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consull, of his owne secking he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So when he beganne to stoupe for age, and that he had given over as a man at the last cast, to beare office any longer in the state: they saw plainely he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himself.

in olde age to be ouercome with fuch youthfull violence, being farre vnmeete for any of his yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the only cause that moued him to procure Hannibale comfe of Han- death, which bred him much difliking and ill opinion with many. For, after Hanniball had fed a out of his owne contry he went first vnto king Antiochus: who, after he lost the battel in PHRY. GIA, Was glad the ROMAINES grauted him peace with fuch conditions as them felues would Wherefore Hanniball fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered up and downe at the length he came to the realme of BITHYNIA, and remained there about king Prulias the ROMAINES knowinge it well enough; and bicause Hanniball was then an olde broken man, of no force nor power, and one whome fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being fent Ambassador by the Senate, vnto Prusias kinge of Bi-

THYNIA and finding Hanniball there, it grieued him to fee him aliue. So that notwithstanding king of Birhy. Prussias maruelously intreated him, to take pitie apon Hanniball a poore olde man. & his frend who came to him for fuccor : yet he coulde not perswade Titus to be content he should line s Hanniball long before had received aunswer of his death from an oracle, to this effect. The valliant corps of Hanniball. when he is dead and colde.

So. Hanniball vnderstoode that of Lybia, as if he should have dyed in Africke, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certaine fandy contry in BITHYNIA neere to the seaes side. where there is a little village called LIBYSSA, and where Hanniball remained continually, He mistrusting king Prusias faynte harte, and fearing the ROMAINES malice also, had made seven priny caues and vaultes under groundelonge before, that he might fecretly go out at either of them which way he woulde, and every one of them came to the maine vault where himfelfe did lye, and coulde not be discerned outwardly. When it was tolde him that Titus had willed ly Prulias to deliver him into his handes he fought then to faue him felfe by those mynes; buthe found that all the ventes out, had watch and ward apon them by the kinges commaundement.

So then he determined to kill him felfe. Now foine fay, that he wounde a linnen towell harde about his necke, and commaunded one of his men he should fet his knee vpon his buttocke, and waying hard vpon him, holding the towell fast he should pull his necke backeward with all the power and strength he could, and neuer linne pressing on him, till he had strangled him, Other fay that he drancke bulles blood, as Midas and Themistocles had done before him, But Midas and Titus Linius wryteth, that he had poyfon which he kept for fuch a purpose, and tempereditin Themistocles a cuppe he helde in his handes, and before he dranke, he spake these wordes. Come on letvs deliuer the ROMAINES of this great care, fith my life is fo grieuous to them, that they think E it to long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate fo much: and yet Titus by this shall winne no honorable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient Ro-MAINES, who aduertifed king Pyrrus their enemy, even when he made warres with them, and

And then I in contrariwife they did much honor and commend the clemency and noble minde of Scipio A FRICAN. Who having ouercomen Hanniball in battell, in A FRICKE selfe, and being then

many matters, they discended in the ende to talke of auncient Captaines: and Hanniball gaue Hannibale indgement, that Alexander the great was the famousest Captaine, Pyrrus the second, and him indgement of 3 felfe the thirde. Then Scipio finilinge, gently asked him : what wouldest thou fay then, if I had Capraines. not overcome thee? Truely, quod Hanniball, I would not then put my felfe the third man but the first, and about all the Captaines that ever were. So divers greatly comending the good-le savinges and deedes of Scipio, did maruelously missike Titus, for that he had? as a man may (av) laved his handes upon the death of an other man. Other to the contray againe favd, it was well done of him, favinge, that Hanniball fo longe as he lived, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not his hande nor body that troubled the ROMAINES, fo much, but his great wifedome and skill he had in the warres, and the mortall hate he bare in his hart towardes the Ro-MAINES, which neither yeares, neither age would diminishe or take away. For mens naturall condicions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwayes keepe in a state, but chaungeth stil, and then quickeneth vp our defires to fet willingly vppon those that warre against vs, bicause they have vs in their hartes. The thinges which fell out afterwards, did greatly proue the reafons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. Tis time nowe we come to compare them together. Therefore as A touchinge the great benefits that came to the GREECIANS, neither Philopamen, nor all the other former Captaines are to be compared With Titus. For all the auncient Captaines almost being GREECIANS Bridge Marres with other GREECIANS: but Titus beinge a ROMAINS, 2 and no GREECIAN, made warres for the liberty of GREECE. When Philopemen was not able to helpe his poore citizens diffressed fore. & vexed with warres, he fayled away into CRBTA. Titus having out come Philip kinge of MACEDON in battell, did restore againe toli-rall of the Achaians, made more Greecians to be flaine, then Titus did of the Macabo NIANS, fightinge with them for the liberty of the GREECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke and sodainly angered, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left kinge Philip his realme and crowne after he had ouercome him, and vied great elemency towardes the ÆTOLIANS: where Phie lopamen for fpite, & malice, tooke townes and villages from his owne native contry, and city, wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a founde frend to them, to whome he had once professed frendshippe, and done pleasurevinto : and Philopamen, in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had given, and to ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopæmen when he had done the C

LACED EMONIANS great pleafure, did afterwards rafe the walls of their city and spoyled and destroyed all their contry: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernment. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choller, he was him selfe cause of his owne death, for that he made berry all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any wil

tius wifer the tus, who did all his affaires with wifedome, and euer confidered what was best to be done. But Philipamen. if we looke into the number of battells, and victories: the warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battells. Whereas Philopamen in infinite battells in which he had the better, neuer left it doutfull, but that his skill did euer helpe him the more to victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wanne honor by meanes of the power of Rome, when it florished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopamen made him selfe famous by his D deedes, when GREECE beganne to stoupe and fall all together. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the ROMAINES: & the dedes of the other, were private to himselfe alone. For Titus was General ouer good and valliant fouldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopamen being chosen Generall, didtraine his men him selfe, & made them afterwards labamen had continuall warres with the GREECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he lad. but that it made a certaine proofe of his valliantnesse. For where all other thinges are aunswerable to his, there we must judge that such as ouercome, have the most corage. Now Phi-Inhamen making warres with the most warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACED EMONIANS) did ouercome the fubtillest of them, by finenesse and policy : and the most valliant, by prowes and hardinesse. But Titus ouercame, by putting that only in practife. which was already found and stablished: as the discipline of the warres, and order of battell, in the which his fouldiers had longe before bene trained. Whereas Philopamen brought into his contry, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accustomed vnto. So that the chiefest point how to winne a battell, was found out a new, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neaer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vie it, and had founde it out already before. Againe, touching the valliant actes done in the person of them selves, many notable actes may be told of philonemen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedemus an ETOLIAN, who flowtinge Titus one day, fayd in his reproche: that at a day of battell, when Philopamen ranne with his fword in his hande, to that fide where he faw the MACEDONIANS fighting, & making hed against the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto heaven, and was busic at his prayers to the gods, not stirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the sword, & to fight of all handes. All the goodly deedes Titus ever did, were done alwaies as a Conful, must not be at Cor Lieutenant, or a Magistrate: whereas Philopamen shewed him selfe vnto the Achans, a his process, man no lesse valliant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a Generall. For except his when he was a Generall, he did drine Nabis the tyran of the LACED EMONIANS out of MES- food. SINA, and deliuered the MESSENIANS out of bondage: and being a private man, he shut the gates of the city of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comminge in, and thereby faued the city from facking. Thus being borne to commaunde, he knew not only how to commaunde according to the law, but could commaund the law it selfe apon necessity, & when the common wealth required it. For at fuch a time he would not tary, while the Magistrates which should gouerne him did geue him authority to commaund, but he tooke it of him felfe, and vied them when D the time ferued: esteeming him in deede their Generall, that knew better then they what was to be done, then him whom they chose of them selues. And therefore they doe well, that doe commende Titus actes, for his clemency, and curtefie, vied to the GREBCIANS: but much Quinitus clemore the noble and valliant actes of Philopamen unto the Romaines. For it is much easier to mency to the pleasure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and resist the strong. Therfore, sithence we have throughly examined, and compared the one with the other: it is very harde to judge altogether the difference that is between them. Peraduenture therefore the judgement woulde not seeme very ill, if we doe gene the Greecian, for discipline of warre, the preheminence and praise of a good Captaine; and to the ROMAINE, for iustice and clemency, the

T is writte, that fince Noes thoud, the first king of the The Sprotians, A and of the Molossians, was Phaëton, one of those who came with Pelasgus, into the realme of Epirvs. But some say otherwise, that Deucalion, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the contry of the MOLOSSIANS. But howfocuer it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the some of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the contry, and after him left a succession of kinges, which were called after his name, the Pyrrides: bicaufe that from his infan-

Pyrrus, redd. cy he was furnamed Pyrrus, as much to fay, as redde: and one of his legittimate fonnes whom he had by Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodes, the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. } And this is the cause why Achilles is honored as a god in Epiros, beinge called in their language, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first kinges of that racevntll the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mencion made of them, nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, bicause they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voyde of ciuility. Tharrytus was in deede the first that beautified the cities of his contry with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in civill lawes and customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharryt is left a fonne called Alcetas, of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came AEacides, who maried Phthia, the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN A famous man in the time of the warres furnamed Lamiacus, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the confederates, after Leosthenes. This AEacides had two daugh C ters by his wife Phthia, to fay, Deidamia and Troiade, and one sonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, & put the crowne into the hands of the sonnes of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the frends of AEacides that could be taken, were generally murdered, and flaine outright. Androclides, & Angelus in the meane time stale away Pirrus, being yet but a fuckling babe (whome his enemies neuerthelesse egerly fought forto haue destroyed) and sled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few servauntes, his nurses and necessary women only to looke to the childe, and give it sucke: by reason whereof their flight was much hindered, so as they could go no great iorneys, but that they might easily be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cause they put the childe into the handes of

Androclion, Hippias, and Neander, three lusty young men, whome they trusted with him, and commaunded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called MEGARES: and Megares a they them selves in the meane time, partely by intreaty, & partely by force, made stay of those sit of Mactthat followed them till night. So as with much a doe havinge driven them backe, they ranne after them that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at funne fet. And now wening they had bene fafe, and out of all daunger: they found it cleane contrary. For when they came to the river vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they faw it fo rough and fwift, that it made them afrayed to beholde it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpoffible to wade through, it was so fore risen and troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darkenesse of the night made every thing feeme feareful vnto them. So as they now that caried the child, thought it not good to venter the paffage ouer of themselves alone, with the women that tendedthe childe: but hearing certaine contrymen on the other fide, they prayed and befought them in the name of the goddes, that they would helpe them to passe ouer the child showing Pyrrus vnto them a farre of. But the contrymen by reason of the roaringe of the river vnderfloode them not. Thus they continued a longe space, the one cryinge, the other lystning, yet could they not vinderstand one an other, til at the last one of the company bethought him selfe to pill of a peece of the barke of an oke, & vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the childe. Which he tyed to a stone to gene it weight, and so threw it ouer to the other fide of the river: other fay that he did pricke the barke through with the point of a dart which he cast ouer. The contrymen on the other side of the river, havinge redwhat was wrytten, and understanding thereby the present daunger the childe was in : felled downe trees in all the hast they could possibly, bounde them together, and so passed ouer the river. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed over, and tooke the child, was called Achilles: the refidue of the contrymen passed ouer also, and tooke the other that came with the childe, and conueyed them ouer as they came first to hand. And thus having escaped their hads, by easie iorneys they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they Glaucias king found in his house sitting by his wife: and layed downe the childe in the middest of the flower of Illyria. before him. The king hereuppon stayed a fong time without vttering any one word, waying with him selse what was best to be done : bicause of the searche had of Cassander, a mortall enemy of AEacides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of D the kinges gowne, and scrawled vp by that, and so got vp on his feete against the kings knees. At the first, the king laughed to see the childe : but after it pitied him againe, bicause the child feemed like an humble futer that came to feeke fanctuary in his armes. Other fay that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto the alter of the familiar gods, alongest the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods prouidence, presently deliuered the childe to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to see him brought vp with his owne. Shortely after, his enemies sent to demaunde the childe of him: and moreouer, Caffander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer the childe Fyrrus into his handes. Howebeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was comen to twelue yeares olde, brought him into his contry of E-E PIRV S with an army, and stablished him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maiesty in his countenaunce, but yet in deede more fearefull then frendly. He had also no teeth in his Portus Countenaunce. vpper iawe that stoode distinctly one from an other, but one whole bone through out his tenamee and gomme, marked a little at the top only, with certaine riftes in the place where the teeth should teeth. bedeuided. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had lost a the battell: Pyrrus neuer forfooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GREECE. which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrize and Ptolomie. Pyrrus was fent an oftage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGIPTE: wherehe made Ptolomie know (both in huntinge, and in other exercises of his persone) that he was very ftrong, harde, and able to endure any labor. Furthermore perceiving that Berenise among all king Ptolomies wives, was best beloved and esteemed of her husbande, both for her verme and wisedome: he beganne to entertaine and honor her aboue all the rest. For he was a man Pirtus beha- that could tell how to humble him felfe towardes the great (by whom he might winne benefit) and knewe also how to creepe into their credit; and in like manner was he a great scomer and despifer of such as were his inferiors. P) 1744 mari- bande of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom the had by Philip, before the was maried vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the allyance of that mariage, more and more into estimacion and fauor by meanes of his wife Antigona, who shewed her selfeyery vertuous and louing towardes him: he found meanes in the ende, to get both men and money to return again into the realme of Epirvs, and to conquer it: fo was he then very well received of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, bicause he det both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithstandinge, Pyrrus fearinge least Neoptolemus would repaire vnto some of the other kings, to seeke ayde against him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed betwene them, that they should both togetherbe D kinges of Epiros. But in processe of time, some of their men secretly made strife againeberealme of E- twene them, and fet them at defyance one with an other: and the chiefest cause as it is sayed that angered Pyrrus most, grew apon this. The kinges of Epinks had an auncient customeof great antiquity, after they had made folemne facrifice vnto Impiter Martiall, (ina certaine place in the province of Molosside, called Passaron) to take their othe, and to be sworne to the EPIROTES, that they would raigne well and justly, according to the lawes and ordinaunces of the contry: and to receive the subjectes othes interchaungeably also, that they would defend and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like maner. This ceremony was done in the presence of both the kinges, and they with their frendes did both gene and receive presentes eche of other. At this meetinge and solemnity, amonge other, one Ge-E lon a most faithfull servaunt and assured frend vnto Neoptolemus, who besides great showes of frendshippe and honor he did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two payer of draught oxen, whichone Myrtilus a cuppebearer of Pyrrus beinge present, and seeinge, did craue of his master. But Pyrrus denyed to geue them ynto him whereat Myrtilus was very angry. Gelon perceiuinge that Mytilus was angry, prayed him to suppe with him that night. Now some say, he sought to abuse Myrtilus, bicause he was fayer and younge: and beganne to perswade him after supper to take parte with Neoptolemus, and to poylon Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he was willing to geue eare to this perswasion, and to be well pleased withall. But in the meane time, he went and tolde his master of it, by whose commaundement he made Alexierates, Prime chiefe cuppebearer, to talke with Gelon about this practife, as though he had also genenhis consent to it, and was willinge to be partaker of the enterprise. This did Pyrrus to hauetwo witnesses, to proue the pretended poysoninge of him. Thus Gelon beinge finely deceived, and a Neobtolemus also with him, both imagininge they had cunningly sponnethe threde of their reason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not kepe it to him selfe, but told it to cerraine of his frendes. And on a time going to be mery with his fifter, he could not keepe it in. but must be practing of it to her, supposing no body had heard him but her selfe, bicause there was no living creature neere them, faving Phanareta Samons wife, the kinges chiefe heardman of all his beaftes, and yet she was layed apon a little bed by, and turned towards the walk: so that the feemed as though the had flept. But having heard all their talke, and no body miltrusting her the next morning the went to Antigona king Pyrrus wife, and told her enery words what the had heard Neoptolemus fay to his fifter. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenaunce of any thing at that time, But havinge made facrifice vnto the goddes, he bad Menpelemus to supper n to his house, where he flue him, being well informed before of the good will the chiefest men of the realme did beare him, who wished him to dispatch Neoptolemas, & not to content him selfe with a peece of Epirvs only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great thinges : and for this cause therefore, this suspition fallinge out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus, and flue him first. And furthermore, remembringe the pleasures he had Pyrus flue received of Ptolomie and Berenice, he named his first some by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and Responsement having built a city in the PRESCOVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BARENIEUDA. When he Berenicida, a had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined city of Epiric with him selfe howe to winne that which lay neerest vnto him: and so tooke occasion by this Presique. meanes, first to set foote into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldest some of Cassander, called Prints first Antipater, put his owne mother The falonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out Macedon, of his owne contry, who fent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus also to his ayde. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not fo quickely go thither. And Pyrrus being arrived there, demanded for his charge fusteined, the citie of NYMPHEA, with all the fea coastes of MACEDON: and besides all that, certaine landes also that were not belonginge to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kinges of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All thefe, the young king Alexander leaninge vnto him, he tooke possession thereof, and put good garrisons into the same in his owne name : and conquering the rest of MACED ON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great distresse. In the meane time kinge Lysimachus lacked no good will to helpe D Antipater with his force, but being busied in other matters, had not the meane to doe it. Howbeit knowinge very well that Pyrrus in acknowledginge the great pleasures he had received of Ptolomie, woulde deny him nothinge: he determined to wryte counterfeate letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leave of the warres begonne against Antipater, and to take of him towardes the defrayinge of his charges, the summe of King Lyfine. three hundred talentes. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch and thus craft to deuise of Lysmachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which hevsed deceive Pyratthe beginning of his letters, was not in them observed: To my some Prerss, health. But in those counterfeate was, king Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: neuerthelesse, afterwardes he made peace with an-E tipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworne vpon the sacrifices vnto the atticles of peace. There were three beaftes brought to be facrificed, a goate, a bul, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downedead of him felfe before he was touched, whereat all the funders by fell a laughinge. But there was a Soothfayer, one Theodotus, that perswaded Pyrrus notto sweare: saying, that this signe and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings indgenen, a with sodaine death. For which cause Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres bo. They had not bene many dayes together, but thone beganne to mistrust thother, and to spie all the wayes they could to intrappe eche other: but Demetrius embracing the first occasion offered, r preuented Alexander, and flue him, being a young man, and proclaimed him felfeking of M 4- Pyrrus quar-CEDON in his roome. But now that they both occupied all MACED ON between them, and were to make division of one selfe kingdome. Now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrell, to grow the greater betwene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his army to fet apon the Aro. LIAMS, and havinge conquered the contry, left Pantauchus his Lieutenaunt there with a great rus on the other fide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whome he gaue battell, and it was valliantly fought out betwene the fouldiers of either party, but spe. A cially betwene the two Generalls. For doutlesse, Pantauchus was the valliantest Captaine, the flowtest man, and of the greatest experience in armes, of all the Captaines and souldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus trusting in his strength and corage, aduaunced him selfe forwardes, and luftely chalenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other fide being inferior to no king in valliantnes, nor in desire to winne honor, as he that would ascribe vnto himselfe the glory of Achilles, more for the imitacion of his valliancy, then for that he was discended of his blood: paffed through the middest of the battell vnto the first rancke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they beganne to charge one an other, first with their dartes, and then comming nearer, fought with their fwordes, not only artificially, but also with great force and fary: vntill fuch time as Fyrrus was hurte in one place, and he hurte Pantauchus in two. they brake the battell of the MACED ONIAN footemen: & having put them to flight, followed them so lively, that they slewe a great number of them, and tooke five thousande prisoners.

This ouerthrowe did not so much fill the hartes of the MACEDONIANS with anger, forthe losse they had received, nor with the hate conceived against Pyrrus: as it wanne Pyrrus great

ing at a feast one day, a question was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the flute, Python or Cephesias: whereunto he aunswered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best Captaine, as if he would have fayd, that was the only thing a prince should seeke for, and Proving good- which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his frendes, easie to forgeue when any had offended him, and maruelous desirous to requite and acknowledge any curtefie or pleasure by him received. And that was the cause why he did very vnp2-F ciently take the death of AEropus, not fo much for his death (which he knewe was a common thing to every living creature) as for that he was angry with himselfe he had deferred the time a follong that time it felfe had cut him of from all occasion and meanes to require the currelies he had received of him. True it is that money lent, may be repayed again evintothe heires of the lender; but yet it greueth an honest nature, when he can not recompence the good will of certains witthe lender, of whom he hath received the goodturne. An other time Pyrrus being in the city 19 Jayinges of of A MB RACIA, there were certaine of his frends that gaue him counsel to put a naughty man out of the city that did nothing but speake ill of him. But he aunswered, it is better (quod he) mkeepe him here still, speakinge ill of vs but to a fewe : then driving him away, to make him fneake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youthes were brought before him on a time, who making mery together, drinking freely, were bolde with the king to speake their pleasure of him in very vinduetifull forte. So, Pyrrus askinge them whether it was true they fayed fo or no: it

After the death of Antigona, he maried many wives to increase his power withall, and to gette Pyrous wines moe frendes. For he maried the daughter of Autoleon kinge of P EONIA, and Bircenna the and children. daughter of Bardillis, king of ILLYRIA, and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyran of Sy-RACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken. By Antigona his first wife, he had a sonne called Ptolomie: By Lanassa, an other called Alexander: and by Bircenna, an other (the youngest of all) called Helenus: all which though they were marshall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought up by him in warres, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradell, They wryte, that one of his fonnes beinge C but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leave his kingdome: Pyrrus auniwe-

called him an Eagle, he aunswered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for an Eagle. your weapons are the winges that have raifed me vp. Shortely after, beinge advertised that Demetrius was fallen ficke, and in great daunger of death, he fodainely went into MACEDON, Pyrus imusonly to inuade it, and to make pray thereof: howbeit he had in deede almost taken the whole don. realme, and made him selfe Lord of all without stroke striken. For he came as farre as the city of Edessa, and found no relistance: but rather to the contrary, many of the contry willingly cameto his campe, and fubmitted them selues. The daunger Demetrius was in to loose his realme, did moue him more: then the disease and sickenes of his body. And on the other side, his frendes, feruauntes, and Captaines, having gathered a great number of men of warre together in maruelous shortetime, marched with great speede towardes Pyrrus, being earnestly bent to do some exploite against him: who being come into MACED ON but to make a roade only apon them, would not tary them, but fled, and flying, loft parte of his men, bicause the E MACED ONI ANS followed him hard, and fet apon him by the way. But now, though they had driven Pyrrus thus easily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light accompt of him: but pretending greater thinges, (as to recouer the landes and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting men, and of fine hundred sayle which he put to my both by the sea) would not stande to make warres against Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS land and sea. (whileft he was absent) so daungerous a neighbour, and so ill to deale withall. But lacking leafure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the ende he might with the more liberty fet apon the other kinges. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius &c Pyrrus, the other kinges and princes beganne to finde out Demetrius intent, and why he had made so great preparation and being afrayed therof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambassadors, that they wondred how he could let go such oportunity and occasion, and to tary till Demetriw might with better leafure make warres vpon him. And why he chose rather to tary & fight with him for the aulters, temples, and sepulchers of the Molossians, when he shoulde be of greater power, and have no warres elsewhere to trouble him: then now that he might easily a drive him out of MACED ON, having fo many things in hand, & being troubled as he was in a ther places. And cofidering also that very lately he had taken one of his wives from him, with the city of CORPHVE. For Lana ffa millikinge, that Pyrrus loued his other wives better then her, (they being of a barbarous natio) got her vnto Corphy E:& desiring to mary some other king, fent for Demetrius, knowinge that he of all other kinges would foonest be wonne there.

Nowethese other kinges that did aduertise Pyrrus in this forte, them selues did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, & yet went on with his preparacion notwithstading, For on the one side, Ptolomie entred GREECE with a great army by sea, where he caused the cities to revolt against him. And Lysimachus on the other side also, entring into a high MACED ON by the contry of THRACIA, burnt and spoyled all as he went. Pyrrus also atminge him selfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROEA, imagining (as afterwardes it sell out) that Demetrius goinge against Lysimachus, would leave all the lowe contry of MACEDON naked, without garrison or defence. And the selfe same night that Pyrrus departed, heimagined that king Alexander the great did call him, and that also he went vnto him, & found him ficke in his bed, of whom he had very good wordes and entertainment: infomuch as he promifed to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined also that he was so bolde to demaundos him againe: how(my Lord)can you helpe me, that lye ficke in your bed? and that Alexander made aunswer: with my name only. And that moreouer he sodainely therewithall got voon his horse Nisea, & rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This vision he had in his dreame. C. which made him bolde, and furthermore encouraged him to goe on with his enterprise. By which occasion, marching forward with all speede, in few dayes he ended his intended iomer to the city of BERROEA, which fodainely he tooke at his first comming to it: the most parte of his army he layed in garrison there, the residue he sent away under the conduct of his Captaines, here and there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius having intelligence hereof, and hearing also an ill rumor that ranne in his campe amongest the MACED ON IANS dust not leade them any further, for feare least (when he should come nere to Lysimachus beingea MACEDONIAN king by nation, & a prince estemed for a famous captaine) they would shrinke from him, & take Lysimachus parte: for this cause therefore he turned againe vpon the sodaine against Pyrrus, as against a straunge prince, & ill beloued of the MACED ONIANS. But whenhe D came to incampe nere him, many cominge from BERROEA into his campe, blew abroadethe praises of Pyrrus, saying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in warres, & one that curteoully intreated all those he tooke to his party. & amongest those, there were other that were nonatural MACED ONIANS borne, but fet on by Pyrrus, & fained them selves to be MACED ONIANS, full, infomuch as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to fee if they could finde out Pyrruto yelde them selues vnto him. He had at that present left of his head peece : by meanewhereof, perceiuing he was not knowen, he put it on againe, and then they knew him a farre of, by the E fight of his goodly fayer plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the toppe of his creaft. Whereupon there came a great number of M ACED ONIANS to his parte, as vnto their foueraine Lord and king, and required the watche word of him. Other put garlandes of oken bowes about their heades, bicause they saw his men crowned after that forte. And some were fo bolde alfo, as to go to Demetrius him felfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he should do very well and wifely to geue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, feeing his campe in fuch vprore, was fo amased, that he knewe not what way to take, but stale away fecretly, difguifed in a threde bare cloke, & a hoode on his head to kepe him from knowledge. Pyrrus foorthwith scafed vppon his campe, tooke all that he founde, and was presently proclaimed in the fielde, king of MACEDON. Lysimachus on thother side, camestraight thither F

ueth inflice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home agains to his kingdome of Epirys, forfakinge MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy enough, and in deede he had good meanes to line peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could have contented him felfe only with the fouerainty ouer his owne naturall subjectes. But thinking, that if he did neither hurtother, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace heshould pyne away for sorow, as Homer sayd of Achilles: He languished and pynde by taking ease and rest: And in the warres where transile was, he liked ener best. words of the And thus feeking matter of newe trouble, fortune presented him this occasion. But shortly af- and Lysinater, they found that this particion was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diffention between them. For they whose auarice and insatiable greedy appetite.neither the fea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable defertes coulde containe, nor yet the con- Compton free funes that separate Asia from Evrope determine: howe should they be content with their owne, without viurping others, when their fronters joyne so necretogether, that nothing demides them? Sure it is not possible. For to fay truely, they are willingly together by the eares. hauing these two cursed thinges rooted in them : that they continually seeke occasion how to furprile eche other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in apparaunce they vie these two tearmes, of peace and warres, as they doe money : vinge it as they Peace, and thinke good, not accordinge to right and inflice, but for their private profit. After him foorthwith lept his gard, his feruauntes, and other his familiar frendes, venturing their lines to faue him. But the darkenes of the night, and rage of the waues (which the shore breakinge, forced beto rebound backe vpon them) with the great noyle also, did so hinder their swimming that itwas euen day before they could recouer any lande, and yet was it by meanes that the winde fell. As for Pyrrus, he was so sea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more:though of himselfe he had so great a harte, & stowte a corage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (vpon whose coast the storme had cast him) ran out Print cest

He trained them out also to exercise their weapons, and shewed him felle very feuere in musters, not pardoning any whose names were billed to serue in the warres; infomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with fuch rough handling & gouernment) for sooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to have liberty to live at their pleasure. Furthermore, Pyrrus having intelligence that Leuinus the Romaine Conful came against him with a great puisant army, and that he was already entred into the lande of Lycania, where he destroyed and spoyled all the contry before him: albeit the TARENT INES aide of their confederates was not as yet comen, he thought it a great shame to suffer his enemies approches nere him, and therefore taking that small number he had, brought them into the fielde against o Leuinus. Howbeit he fent a herauld before to the ROMAINES, to vnderstand of them, iff before they entred into this warre) they could be content the controuerfies they had with all the GREECIANS dwellinge in ITALIE, might be decided by inflice, and therein to referre them felues to his arbitremet, who of him felfe would vndertake the pacification of the, Whereman the Confull Leuinus made aunswere, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a indee. neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherfore Pyrrus going on stil, came to lodge in the plaine which is between the cities of PANDOSIA, & of HERACLEA: & having newes brought him that the ROMAINES were encamped very nere vnto him on the other fide of the river of Siris, he tooke his horse, and rode to the rivers side to view their campe. And speaking to Megalis, one of his familiars about him, he fayd: this order Megacles (quod he) though it be of batharous people, yet is it not barbaroufly done, but we shall shortely proue their force. After he had thus taken this view, he beganne to be more carefull then he was before, and purposed to tary till the whole aide of their confederates were comen together, leaving men at the rivers fide of Siris to kepe the paffage, if the enemies ventured to paffe ouer as they did in dede. For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, & passed their footenen ouer atom a bridge, and their horfemen at diverse fordes of the river: infomuch as the GREECIANS fearinge least they shoulde be compassed in behinde, drew backe. Pyrrus advertised thereof, and being a litle troubled therwithall, commanded the Captaines of his footemen presently to put F. their bandes in battell ray, and not to sturre till they knew his pleasure; and he him selfe in the meane time marched on with three thowsande horse, in hope to finde the Romaines by the river side, as yet out of order, & vtterly vnprovided. But when he saw a farre of a greater number of footemen with their targettes ranged in battell, on this fide the river, and their horsemen marching towardes him in very good order: he caused his men to joyne close together, and him felfe first beganne the charge, being easie to be knowen from other, if it had beneno more but his passinge riche glisteringe armor and furniture, and withall, for that his valliant dedes gaue manifest proofe of his well deserved fame and renowne. For though he valliantly besturred his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet heforgate not him felfe, nor neglected the judgement & forefight, which should never be wanting F in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discretly gate

But even in the hortest of the battell, Leonatus MACE-DONIAN, spyed an I TALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vppe and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hande with him, to fet apon him. Wherefore he favd to Pyrrus: my Lord doe you not fee that barbarous man there vppon a baye horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he ment to doe some notable feate and mischiefe with his delivering his armor and cloke to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it Permy thanwere in Megacles armor, returned againe to the battell against the ROMAINES, who valiantly ged his armor refisted him, so that the victory depended longe in doubt. For it is fayd, that both the one fide of clake. Infomuch as he came within fix and thirty mile of Rome, whither came to his aide as confederates of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, & the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked bicause they came to late to the battel. How beit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not alitle glad and proude to have overthrowen so great an army of the ROMAINES with his owne men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On thother fide, the ROMAINES hartes were so great, that they would not depose Leuinus from his Consull thippe, notwithstandinge the losse he had received : and Caius Fabricius sayed openly, that they were not the Epino-TES that had ouercomen the ROMAINES, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the fubtilty and wife conduction of the Generall, then through the valliant feates and worthines of his army. And hereuppon owne handes: for his eye is neuer of you, but wayteth only apon you, being sharpe set to deale with your felfe & none other, & therefore take hede of him. Pyrrus aunswered him, it is imposfille Leonatus, for a man to auoyde his destinie: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatfoeuer, shall have any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talkinge thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his speare in the middest, and setting spurres to his horse, charged apon Pyrrus and ranne his horse through and through with the same. Leonatus at the selfe same instant ferued the I TALIAN'S horse in the like manner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, faued him presently, and slew the ITALIAN in the fielde, although he fought it out right valliantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the city of FERBNIV M, and was Captaine of a bande of men of armes. This mile haunce made kinge Pyrrus looke the better to him selfe afterwardes, and seeinge his horsemen geue backe. fent presently to hasten his sootemen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and and the other did chase, and was chased, aboue seuen times in that conslict. The chaunginge of the kinges armor ferued very well for the fafety of his owne persone, howebeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him loofe the fielde. For many of his enemies fet vppon and with all shewed foorth the spoyles he supposed to have taken from him. Which being caredabout through all the bands, & openly thewed from hand to hand, made the ROMAINES maruelous ioyfull, and the GREECIANS to the contrary, both afeard and right forowfull; vntill time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed alongest all his bandes bare headed, and n bareleed, holdinge up his hande to his fouldiers, and geuinge them to understande with his ownevoyce, that it was him felfe. The elephantes in the ende were they in deede that wanne the battell, and did most distresse the ROMAINES: for, their horses seeing them a farre of, were foreafrayed, and durst not abide them, but caried their masters backe in despite of them. warre, like men whose hartes were nothinge appawled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelinge much thought good first to send to the Romaines, to proue if they would geue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the city of Rome was no easie matter to copaffe, or attaine, with that strength he presently had : and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this his valliant victory. And hereupon he lent cineas to Rome, who spake with the chiefest of the city, and offred presentes to them and their wines, in the behalfe of the king his mafter. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receive any at his handes, but aunswered all with one voyce: that if the peace might be general to all ded the Ro-

they all privately woulde be at the kinges commaundement, and woulde be glad of his frendshippe. Moreover, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many cur- R teous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulacions of peace: they accepted none. nor shewed any affection to geue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their prisoners home againe without raunsome, that had bene taken at the battell, and promised alfo to aide them in the conquest of I TALIE, requiring no other recompence at their handes. fauing their goodwills only to his master, & assurance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for any thinge past, without demaunde of other matter. Neuerthelesse in the ende, when they had hearde these offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willingeto make peace: alleaginge that they had already loft a great battell, and howe they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE should joyne together with king Prerus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor deltin C matters of state at all by reason of his age, and partely bicause he was blinde: when he vnderstoode of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the city, howethe Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulacions of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his servauntes to cary him in his chaver apon their armes ynto the Senate dore, his fonnes, and fonnes in law taking him in their armes, caried him fo into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honor the comming in of so notable & worthy a perfonage; and he so some as they had sette him in his seate, beganne to speake in this sorte. His therunto with great impacience (my Lordes of Rome) have I borne the loffe of my fight, but ration to the Strate, " now, I would I were also as deafe as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the " now, I would I were allo as deate as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the me " of your dishonorable consultacions determined you in Senate, which tende to subtract the D " glorious fame and reputacion of Rome. What is now become of all your great and mighty " bragges you blased abroade, through the whole worlde? that if Alexander the great himselfe " had come into I TALIB, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not have faved every where that he was altogether inuincible, as now at this present they doe: but either he should have left his body saine herein battell, or at the least wife have bene driven to flic, and by his death or flyinge shoulde greatly ,, have enlarged the renowne and glory of Rome? you plainly show it now, that all these words » spoken the, were but vaine & arrogant vaunts of foolish pride. Considering that you tremble " for feare of the Molossians & Chaonians, who were ever a pray to the Maced Onlans " and that ye are afrayed of Pyrrus also, who all his life time served and followed one of the gard E " vnto Alexander the great, and nowe is come to make warres in these partes, not to aidethe GREECIANS inhabiting in ITALIE, but to flie from his enemies there about his owne contry, offering you to conquer all the rest of ITALIE with an army, wherewith he was nothing able ,, to kepe a small parte of MACEDON only for him selfe. And therefore you must not perswade " your selues, that in making peace with him, you shall thereby be rid of him: but rather shall " you draw others to come & fet apon you belides. For they will vtterly despise you, when they " that heare ye are fo easily ouercome, and that you have suffered Fyrres to escape your handes, " before you made him feele the just reward of his bolde prefumptuous attempt vpon you: carying with him for a further hier, this advantage ouer you, that he hath geuen a great occasion both to the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After F ", that Appine had tolde this tale vnto the Senate, every one through the whole affembly, defi-" red rather warre then peace. They dispatched Cineas away thereupon with this aunswere, that a if Pyrrus fought the ROMAINES frendshippe, he must first departe out of ITALIE, and then fende vnto them to treate of peace: but folonge as he remained there with his army, the Ro-HAINES would make warres vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowen and flaine tenne thowfand fuch Captaines as Leninus was. They fav that Cineas, during the time of his abode at Rome, intreating for this peace, did curiously laborto consider and understande, the manners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their common weale, discoursing thereof with the chiefest men of the city: and how afterwards he made ample reporte of the same vnto Pyrrus, and tolde him amongest other thinges, that the Senate appeared to him, a counsell house of many kinges. And furthermore (for the number The maisslife of people) that he feared greatly they should fight against such a ferpent, as that which was in of the Senate olde time in the marifes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut of one heade, seuen other as Rome. came up in the place: bicause the Consull Leuinus had nowe leavied an other army, twise as great as the first was, and had left at Rome also, many times as many good able men to cary armor. After this, there were fent Ambassadors from Rome vnto Pyrrus, and amongest other. Cajus Fabricius touching the state of the prisoners. Cineas tolde the kinge his master, that this caius Fabri-Fabricius was one of the greatest menne of accompt in all Rome, a right honest man, a good cias, Am-Captaine, and a very valliant man of his handes, yet poore in deede he was not with standing, Privis, Privas taking him secretly a side, made very much of him, and amongest other thinges, offe- Caius Fabrired him bothe golde and filuer, prayinge him to take it, not for any dishonest respect he courses, but ment towardes him, but only for a pledge of the goodwill and frendshippe that should be betwene them. Fabricius would none of his gift: so Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithstan-Fabricius reding, the next morninge thinkinge to feare him, bicause he had neuer seene elephant before, Print with Pyrrus commaunded his men, that when they fawe Fabricius and him talkinge together, they shoulde bringe one of his greatest elephantes, and set him harde by them, behinde a hanging: which being done at a certaine figne by Pyrrus geuen, fodamly the hanging was pulled backe, and the elephant with his troncke was ouer Fabricius heade, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius foftely geuing backe, nothing afrayed, laughed and fayd to Fyrrus smiling: neither did your golde (oh king) yesterday moue me, nor your elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileft they were at supper, fallinge in talke of diuerse matters, specially touchinge the flate of GREECE, and the Philosophers there: Cineas by chaunce spake of Epicv Rvs, and rehearfed the opinions of the EPICVRIANS touching the goddes and gouernment of the common wealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleasure, how they fled from all office & The opinion publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: howethey maintained that the goddes were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life felleity. full of all pleasures and delightes, without taking any regarde of mens doinges. But as he still continued this discourse, Fabricius cried out alowde, and sayd: the goddes graunt that Prrrus and the Samnites were of fuch opinions, as long as they had warres against vs. Pyrrus marueling much at the constancy and magnanimity of this man, was more desirous a great deale to have peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And privately prayed Fabricius very earnestly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remaine with him. faying: that he would give him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongest all his frendes. Whereunto Fabricius aunswered him softly: that were not good (oh king) for your selfe, gliod he: for your men that presently doe honor and esteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather choose me for their kinge, then your selfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whose wordes Pyrrus tooke not in ill parte, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyran woulde hauebene: but did him felfe reporte to his frendes and familiars the noble minde he founde in him, and delivered him apon his faith only, all the ROMAINE prisoners: to the ende that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet fee their frendes, and kepe the feast of Saturne with them, and then to fend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate establi- King Porm thed by decree, vpon paine of death to all fuch as should not performe the same accordingly. Phistian Afterwardes Fabricius was chosen Consull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to Fabricius, & him that brought him a letter from kinge Pyrrus Phisitian, wrytten with his owne handes: in offereth to which the Philitian offered to poylon his mailter, so he would promise him a good reward, for muster, ending the warres without further daunger. Fabricius detestinge the wickednesse of the Phis. tian, and having made Q. AEmilius his colleague, and fellowe Confull also, to abhorre the fame: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heede, for there were that ment to poylon him. The contentes of his letter were these: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus AEmylius Confuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (oh king) made vnfortunate choife, both of your frendes and of your enemies, as shall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter, which one of yours hath wrytten vnto vs : for you make warres with iust and honest men, and do your selfe trust altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therfore we have thought good to aduer. tise vou, not in respect to pleasure you, but for feare least the missortune of your death might make vs vniustly to be accused : imagining that by trechery of treason, we have sought to end this warre, as though by valliantneffe we coulde not otherwise atchieue it. Pyrrus having red R this letter, and proued the contentes thereof true, executed the Phisitian as he had deserved and to requite the aduertisement of the Consulls, he sent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their prisoners, without payinge of raunsome, and sent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit, the Romaines, bicause they would neither receive pleasure out raunsome. Of their enemies, and least of all reward, for that they consented not vnto so wicked a deede did not only refuse to take their prisoners of free gift, but they sent him againe so many SAM-NITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace, and his frendshippe, they would gene no eare to it, before the warres were ended, and that he had fent away his army againe by fea. into his kingdome of EPIRVS. Wherefore Pyrrus feing no remedy, but that he must needes fight an other battell, after he had somewhat refreshed his army, drewe towardes the cities of ASCVLVM, where he fought the seconde time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into battelwith the maruelous ill grounde for horsemen, by a very swift running river, from whence came many brookes and deepe marishes, infomuch as his elephantes could have no space nor ground to ioine with the battel of the footemen, by reason wherof there was a great number of menhun and slaine on both sides. And in the ende, the battell being fought out all day longe, the darke night did seuer them: but the next morninge, Pyrrus to winne the aduantage to fight in the plaine field, where he might preuaile with the force of his elephantes, fent first certaine of his bandes to feafe vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy having brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thrust in amongest his elephants, store of shot, and slingmen, and then made his army marche (being very well set in order) with D great furie against his enemies. They missinge thother dayes turninges and places of retyre. were now compelled to fight all on a fronte in the plaine fielde: and striuing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footemen before the elephantes came, they desperately preaced in apon their enemies pykes with their fwordes, not caring for their owne persones what became of them, but only looked to kill and destroy their enemies. In the ende notwithstandinge, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES lost it, and they first beganne to breake and flie on that fide where Pyrrus was, by reason of the great force and furie of his charge, and much more through the violence of the elephantes: against which, the Romaines valliantnes nor corage coulde ought preuaile, but that they were driven to geve them place (much like the rage of furging waves, or terrible tremblinge of the earth) rather then tary to be troden under E feete, and ouerthrowen by them, whome they were not able to hurte againe, but be by them most greuously martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothinge eased. The chase was not long, bicause they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the historiographer writeth, that there died fix thowsande men of the ROMAINES, and of Pyrrus parte about three thowsande fine hundred and fine, as the kinges owne Chronicles doe witnesse. Neuerthelesse. Dionysius makes no mencion of two battell's geuen neere vnto the city of Ascvivm, nor that the Ro-MAINES were certainely ouerthrowen: howbeit he confirmeth that there was one battellonly that continued vntil funne set, and that they scarcely seuered also when night was comeon, Pyrrus being hurte on the arme with a speare, and his cariage robbed and spoiled by the Sam-NITES besides. And surther, that there died in this battell, aboue sisteene thowsande men, as F well of Pyrrus fide, as of the ROMAINES parte: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retyre. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus aunswered one, who rejoyced with him for the victory they had wonne: if we winne an other of the price, quod he, we are vitterly vidone. For in dede the had he lost the most parte of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his frendes and Captaines in manner euery one, or at the least there lacked lirle of it: and besides that, he had no meanes to supplie them with other from thence, and perceiued also that the consederates he had in ITALIE, beganne to waxe colde. Where the Ro-MAINES to the contrary, did eafily renue their army with freshe souldiers, which they caused to come from ROME as neede required, (much like vnto a lively spring, the head whereof they had at home in their contry) and they fainted not at all for any losses they received, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, stowtely determining to abide out the warres, what ener betyde. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this forte, newe hopes, and newe enterprises were offred vnto him, that made him doubtful what to do. For eue at a clap came Amhaffadors to him out of Sicilia, offering to put into his handes, the cities of Syracy sa, of ambelladors AGRIGENTYM, and of the LEONTINES, and befeeching him to aide them to drive the CAR- out of Sicilia THAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrannes. And on the other 10 pray aide fide alfo, newes was brought him from GREECE, howe Ptolomie furnamed the lightning was flaine, and all his army ouerthrowen in battell against the GAVLES, and that now he shoulde come in good hower for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he curfed his hard fortune that presented him all at once, such fundry occasions to doe great thinges: and as if both enterprifes had bene already in his hande, he made his accompt that of necessitie he must loofe one of them. So, long debating the matter with him felte, which of the two wayes he should conclude uppon: in the ende he resolved, that by the warres of Sicilia, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, considering that A FRICKE was not farre from them. Wherefore, disposinge him selfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to speake to the townes and cities of the contry as he was wont to doe; and in the meane time left a strong garrison in the city of TARENTVM, to kepe it at his deuotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made request vnto him, either to remaine into Sicilia. in their contry to maintaine warres with them against the ROMAINES, (which was their meaning why they fent for him)or elfe if he would needes go, at the least wise to leave their city in as good state as he founde it. But he aunswered them againe very roughly, that they shoulde freake no more to him in it, and that they should not choose but tary his occasion. And with this aunswere tooke shippe, and sailed towardes Sicilia: where so soone as he was arrived, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingely put them selues into his handes. And where necessity of battell was offered him to employ his army nothing at the beginning could stande before him. For, with thirty thowsande footemen, two thowsande fine hundred horsemen, and two hundred sayle which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIans before him, and conquered all the contry under their obedience. Nowe at that time, the city of ERIX was the strongest place they had, and there were a great number of good foul- Pyrrus name diers within it to defende it. Pyrrus determined to proue the affault of it, and when his army the tip of E-vix in Sicilia. was ready to geue the charge, he armed him felfe at all peeces from toppe to toe, and approching the walls, yowed ynto Hercules to geue him a folemne facrifice, with a feaft of common playes, so that he would graunt him grace to shew him selfe vnto the GREECIANS inhabiting in Sicilia, worthy of the noble auncesters from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his handes. This vowe ended, he straight made the trompettes found to the affault, & caused the barbarous people that were on the walles, to retyre with force of his shot. Then when the scaling ladders were set up, him selfe was the first that mounted on the walle, where he found diverfe of the barbarous people that refifted him. But some he threw over the walles on either fide of him, and with his fword flew many dead about him, himfelfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the harte to looke him in the face, his countenaunce was so terrible. And this doth proue that Homer spake wisely, and like a man of experience, when he favd: that valliantnesse onely amongest all other morall vertues is that, which hath Homer of fomtimes, certaine furious motions and divine provocations, which make a man befides him vallianimes. felfe. So the city being taken, he honorably performed his vowed facrifice to Heronles, & kept a feast of all kindes and fortes of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GREECIANS the. abouts, makinge many of them pay taxe and tribute: for they were a great number of them and all men of warre and good fouldiers, and had their name also of Mars, bicause they were marshall men, and geuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army against them, and ouerthrew themin battell; and put their collectors to death, that did leavy and exact the taxe, and rafed many of their fortresses. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his frendship, offering him shippes and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a shorte aunswere, that there was but one way to make peace and loue between them, to forfake Sicilia altogether and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GREECE and them. Forhis good fortune, and the force he had in his handes, did fet him aloft, and further allured hims follow the hope that brought him into Sicilia, aspiring first of all vnto the conquest of Li- 1 BYA. Now, to passe him ouer thither, he had ships enough, but he lacked owers & mariners wherefore when he would presse them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of S. CILIA, and in anger compelled, and seuerely punished them, that would not obey his commaundement. This he did not at his first comminge, but contrarily had wonne all their good wills, speaking more curteously to them then any other did, and shewing that he trusted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But fodainly being altered from a populer prince, vnto a violent tyran, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worst of all is, vn. faithfull and ingratefull: neuertheleffe, though they received great hurt by him, yet they fulfered it, and graunted him any needefull thing he did demaund. But when they faw he been to mistrust Thanon and Sostratus, the two chiefe Captaines of Syracvsa, and they who first caused him to come into Sicilia, who also at his first arrivall delivered the city of Syracve s a into his hands, & had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compasse that he had done in Sicilia: when I fay they faw he would no more cary them with him, nor leaue thembehinde him for the mistrust he had of them, and that Softratus fled from him, and absented him felfe, fearing least Pyrrus would doe him some mischiefe; and that Pyrrus moreover, had pur Thenon to death, mistrusting that he would also have done him some harme. Then all things fell out against Pyrrus, not one after an other, nor by litle and litle, but all together at one inftant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe some of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to fetvpon him. But when all Sicilia was thus bent against him, he received letters from the Samnites & Ta-D and Taren. RENTINES, by which they aduertised him, how they had much a doe to defende them selues tines for fir within their cities and strong holdes, and that they were wholly driven out of the field:wherfore they earnestly befought him speedily to come to their aide. This newes came happely to him, to cloke his flying, that he might fay it was not for dispaire of good successe in Sich Linthat he went his way: but true it was in dede, that when he saw he could no longer keepe it, then a shippe could stand still among the waves, he fought some honest shadow to colour his departing. And that furely was the cause why he returned againe into I TALIE. Neuertheleffe, at his departure out of SICILE, they fay that looking backe apon the Ile, he faid to thole that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell, my frendes, doe we leaue to the Ro-MAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight thone with thother? And verily fo it fell out shortely after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous people conspiringe together against Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one side watching his passage, gaue him battel on the sea, in the veraly suref Si. ry straight it selfe of MESSINA, where helost many of his ships, and fled with the rest, & tooke the coast of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other side, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteene thowsande fighting men: durst not present him battell inopen fielde, but taried for him in certaine straites of the mountaines, & in very hard places, and To fet vpon his rereward, and disordered all his army. They slew two of his elephants, and cut of a great number of his rereward, so as he was compelled him selfe in persone to come from his vangard, to helpe them against the barbarous people, which were lusty valliant men, and much the more encorage his enemies. Among which there was one more aduenturous then

therest, a goodly man of personage, fayer armed in white armor, who aduauncing him selfe farre before his company, cried our to the king with a bolde and fierce voyce, and chalenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus beinge mad as it were with this brauery, turned againe with his garde, in spight of his men, hurt as he was. And besides that he was all on a fre with choller, and his face all bloody and terrible to behold, he went through his men and rameat the length to this barbarous villen that had challenged him: & gaue him fuch a blow Pyrous with a on his head with all his force and power, that what by the strength of his arme, and through him the goodnes of the temper and mettle of the fword, the blow claue his head right in the mid- his entities delt, downe to the shoulders: so that his heade beinge thus deuided, the one parte fell on the bead in the one (houlder, & the other parte on the other. This matter fodainly stayed the barbarous neoa ple, and kept them from goinge any further, they were so asrayed and amaled both to see so his Coulders. great a blowe with ones hande, and it made them thinke in dede that Pyrrus was more then a man, After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iornev. artined at the length in the city of TARENT VM, with twenty thowfand footenen. & three thowfand horse. And with these (ioyning thereto the choycest pyked men of the TARBNTINES) he went incontinently into the field to feeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within the territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard state. For their hartes were killed bicause that in many battells and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were ever overthrowen. They were very angry befides with Pyrrus, for that he had forfaken them, to goe his voyage vnto Sicilia, by reason whereof there came no great number of souldiers into his campe. But notwithstanding, he deuided all his strength into two partes, whereof he sent the one parte into L v c A N I A, to occupy one of the R O M A INE Confulls that was there, to the end he should not come to aide his companion: and with the other parte he went him selfe agaith Manius Curius, who lay in a very straunge place of aduantage nere to the citie of BE- Manius Curi-NEVENTO, attending the aide that should come to him out of L v c ANI A, besides also that the w confid. Soothfayers (by the fignes & tokens of the birdes and facrifices) did counfell him not to sturre from thence. Prerus to the contrary, defiring to fight with the danius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of Ly CANIA, tooke with him the best souldiers he had in all his army, and the warlikest elephantes, and marched away in the night, supposing to steale vpon Marius on the fodgine, and geue an affault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus having a long way to ngo, and through a woddy contry, his lightes and torches failed him, by reason whereof many of his fouldiers loft their way, and they loft a great deale of time also before they could again begathered together; fo as in this space the night was spent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceived plainely how he came downe the hills. This at the first fight made the muse awhile, and put them in a litle feare: nevertheleffe Manius having had the fignes of the facrifices fauorable, and feeing that occasion did presse him to it, went out into the field, and set a- Processing pon the vowarde of his enemies, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the battell with reft in fuch wife, that there were flaine a great number of them in the fielde, and certaine elephantes also taken. This victory made Manius Curius leave his strength, and come into the thronen by plaine field, where he fet his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on Manius Curitheone side: but on the other he was repulled by violence of the elephantes, and compelled "in basell. to drawe backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to garde it. So when he faw them upon the rampers of his campe all armed ready to fight he called them out and they comming fresh out of places of advantage to charge vpon theielephantes, compelled them in a very (horte time to turne their backes, & flie through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble, and disorder : so as in the ende, the whole victory fell apon the Ro-MAINES fide, and confequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatnes and power of their Empire. For the Romannes being growen more coragious by this battell, and hauing increased their force, and wonne the reputation of men vinconquerable simmediarly after conquered all ITALIE besides, and soone after that, all SICILIA. To this ande as you see, came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALLE and SICILIA, after he had spent sixe yeares continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed & his army confumed. Notwithstanding, his noble corage remained alwayes inuincible, what losses socuet he had fusteined:and moreover whilest he lived, he was ever esteemed the chiefest of all the kinns & princes in his time as well for his experience & fufficiency in warres, as also for the valliant nes and hardines of his person. But what he wanne by famous deedes, he lost by vaine hope defiring fo earnestly that which he had not, as he forgate to kepe that which he had. Where fore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice player that casteth well, but can not vie his lucke Now having brought backe againe with him into Epirvs, eight thowfande footemen, and five hundred horsemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuised with him selfem feeke out some new warre to entertaine those souldiers, and kepe them together. Wherefore yppon a newe aide of certaine of the GAVLES beinge comen vnto him, he entered into the realme of MACHDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius fonne held atthat time) with intent only to make a forrey, and to get some spoyle in the contry. But when he saw that he had taken dis uerfe holdes, and moreouer, that two thowfand men of warre of the contry came and yelded them selves vnto him: he beganne to hope of better successe, then at the first he looked for Proper vitte. For you that hope he marched against king Antigonus selfe, whom he met in a very straight valley, and at his first comming, gaue such a lusty charge upon his rereward, that he purall 4 tigonus army in great disorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his army to close it in, which were a convenient number, and did valliantly defend the first charge and the skirmishe was so hotte, that the most of them were slaine. After them, the leaders of the elephantes perceiuing they were enuironned on euery fide, yelded them felues and their beaftes. Pyrrus feeing his power to be now increased with fuch a supply, trusting more to his good fortune, then any good reason might moue him: thrust further into the battel of the Ma. C.

hande, and callinge the Captaines of the bandes by their names, straight wayes made all the footemen of Antigonus turne wholly to his fide: who flying, faued him felfe with a few horses men, and kept certaine of the cities in his realme apon the fea coast. But Pyrrus in all his prosperity, judging nothing more to edownde to his honor and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aside their goodliest and richest spoyles, and offred up the same in the semple of Minerua Itonida, with this inscription.

they would not once base their pykes, nor fight against him. He for his parte holdinge vp his

From age to age, and time to time, in AEacus his race. Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACED ON yelded vnto him but when he had the citie of ÆGES in his power, he vied the inhabitantes thereof very hard- E ly, & specially because he left a great garrison of the GAVLES there which he had in pay. This nation is extreame couetous, as then they shewed them selues: for they spared not to break vp the tombes wherein the kinges of MACEDON lay buried there, tooke away all the gold and filuer they could finde, and afterwards with great infolency cast out their bones into the open winde. Pyrrus was tolde of it, but he lightly passed it ouer, and made no reckening of it either bicause he deferred it till an other time, by reason of the warres he had then in hande : or else for that he durst not meddle with punishing of these barbarous people at that time. But whatfoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, & blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, having not yet made all thinges fure in MACEDO Nanor beingfully possest of the same: new toyes and hope came into his head, and mocking Antigonus, sayd, he was a mad man to goe apparrelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloke might become him like a private man. Now, Cleonymus king of Spart a being come to procure him to bring A his army into the contry of LACED EMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the blood royall of Sparta, but bicause he was a cruell man, and would do all thinges by authority, they loued him not at Sparta, nor trusted him at all : and therefore did they put him out. & made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had Areus made against the comon wealth of Sparta: but besides that, he had an other private quarrel, which has of Sparta. grewe vppon this cause. In his olde yeares, Cleonymus had maried a fayer younge Lady called to, and Cleo Chelidonide, which was also of the blood royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This Lady be-downe. ing fallen extreamely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his lufty youth, the greatly vexed and dishonored her husbande Cleonymus, who was ouer heade and eares in loue and lealousie with her : for there was not one in all Sparta, but plainely knewe that his wife made none accompt of him. And thus his home forowes, being joyned with his outwarde common greues, euen for spight, desiring a reuenge, in choller he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto Sparta, to restore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACED EMONIA forthwith, with fine and twenty thowfand foote- ponneju. men, two thowsand horse, and source and twenty elephantes: by which preparacion, though by nothing elfe, the worlde might plainely fee, that Pyrrus came with a minde not to reftore Cleanymus againe vnto Sparta, but of intent to conquer for him felfe (if he could) all the conmie of Peloponnesvs. For in wordes he denied it to the LACED EMONIANS them felues, who fent Ambassadors vnto him when he was in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where he tolde Press livethem that he was come into Peloponnesvs, to fette the townes and cities at libertie which regeamers the C Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to fend his young fonnes Spartans. into SPARTA (fo they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LAC o-NIAN manner, and from their youth haue this advantage about all other kinges, to haue bene well brought vp, But faining these thinges, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the coast of LACONIA, into the which he was no fooner entred, but he beganne to spoyle and wast the whole contry. And when the Ambassadors of Spart a reproued and founde fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in such sorte, before he had openly proclaimed it:he made them aunswer:no more haue telistrunce. For Pyrrus camped before the towne, throughly perswaded with him selfe, that he shouldfinde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus frends and servauntes also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should have come to supper to him, and lodged with him. When nightwa: come, the LACED & MONIANS counselled together, & secretly determined to send stroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counsell, that they should cast a trenche before the enemies campe, and that at both the endes of the same they should bury cartes in the ground vnto the middeft of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the elephantes, and kepe them from passing further. And when they beganne to go in hand withall, there came wives and maides vnto them, some of them their clothes girte vp round about you your felues vied to proclaime that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassadors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in the LACONIAN tongue. If thou Mandricidas D be a god, thou wilt doe vs no hurt, bicause we have not offended thee : and if thou be a man, flows aunswer thou shalt meete with an other that shalbe better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to SPART A. where Cleonymus gaue him counfell even at the first, to assault it. But he would not Prom before fo do, fearing (as they fayd) that if he did it by night, his fouldiers would facke the city: and demon, faydit should be time enough to affault it the next day at broad day light, bicause there were but few men within the towne, and befide they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus him felfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTYNIANS, who had warres in their owne contry. And doutlesse, that only was the saving of Spart a from taking, that they made no reckening to affault it hotly: bicause they thought it was not able to make away their wives, and litle children into CRET A. But the women them selves were against it, The corage of and there was one amonge them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate house with a the women of fword in her hand, to speake vnto them in the name of all the rest, and sayd: that they did their Sparia, wines great wronge, if they thought them so fainte harted, as to line after Sparta were deyoung men that should fight the next morning, to rest them selues in the meane while, Sobbel women tooke the third parte of the trenche to taske, which was fix cubittes broade, fourer, bits deepe, and eight hundred foote long as Philarchus fayth: or litle leffe as Hieronymus wer. teth. Then when the breake of day appeared, & the enemies remoued to come to the affair the women them selues setched the weapons which they put into the young mens hands and deliuered them the taske of the trenche ready made, which they before had vndertaken, practicely ing them valliantly to keepe and defend it, tellinge them withall, howe great a pleafure it is ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and fight of their native contry, and what greately city and honor it is to dye in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valliands like an honest man, and worthy of the magnanimity of Sparta. But Chelidonida being gone fide, had tyed a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to strangle & hang her felt. rather the to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chaunce the city should come to betaken Pyrrus hattel. Now Pyrrus marched in person with his battell of footemen, against the fronte of the Spire. TANS, who being a great number also, did tary his comming on the other side of the trenche the which, besides that it was very ill to passe ouer, did let the souldiers also to fight steadelyin order of battell, bicause the earth being newly cast vp, did yeld under their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomie king Pyrrus fonne, paffing all alongest the trench side with two thowsand Gaviers all the choyce men of the CHAONIANS, affayed if he could get ouer to the other fide at one of the endes of the trenche where the cartes were: which being fet very deepe into the ground and one joyned vnto an other, they did not only hinder thaffaylants, but the defendants also Howbeit in the end, the GAV LES began to plucke of the wheeles of these cartes, and to draw them into the river. But Acroratus, king Areus sonne, a young man, seeing the daunger, range through the city with a troupe of three hundred lufty youthes befides, & went to inclofe Ptalomie behinde before he espied him, for that he passed a secret hollow way till he came events geue the charge vpon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towardeshim. one runninge in an others necke, and foin great diforder were thrust into the trenches, and vnder the cartes:infomuch as at the last, with much a doe, and great bloodshed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulfed them. Now the women and old men, that were on thother fide of the trenche, faw plainly before their face, howe valliantly Acrotatus hadrepulsed the GAVLES. Wherefore, after Acrotatus had done this exployte, he returned against through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare blood, coragious and D lively, for the victory he came newly from. The women of Sparta thought Acrotatus fane more noble and fayrer to beholde, then ever he was : fo that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue such a frend and louer. And there were certaine olde men that followed him, crying after him, goe thy way Acrotatus, and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble childrenol her vnto Spart A. The fight was cruell on that fide where Pyrrus was, and many of the Spar TAN'S fought very valliantly. Howbeit amongest other, there was one named Phillius, who a ter he had fought long, and flaine many of his enemies with his owne handes, that forced to passe ouer the trenche: perceiuing that his hart fainted for the great number of woundede had apon him, called one of them that were in the rancke next behinde him, and gening him his place, fell downe deade in the armes of his frendes, bicause his enemies shoulde not have E his body. In the ende, the battell havinge continued all the day longe, the night did eparate them: and Pyrrus being layed in his bed, had this vision in his sleepe. He thought he trakette city of LACED & MONWith lightning, and that he vtterly confumed it: whereat he was sopalfing glad, that even with the very joy he awaked. And thereuppon foorthwith commaunded his Captaines to make their men ready to the affault: and told his dreame vnto his familiers, fuppoling that out of dout it did betoken he should in that approache take the citie. All that heard it, beleued it was fo, fauing one Lysimachus: who to the contrary, sayed that this vision liked him not, bicause the places sinitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also affraied, that the goddes did signife vnto him, that he should not enter into the citie of S PARTA. Pyrrus aunswered him: that saied he, is a matter F disputable to & fro in an open assembly of people, for there is no maner of certainty in it. But furthermore, euery man must take his weapon in his hand, & set this sencence before his eyes

Alludinge vnto Homers verses, which he wrote for the defence of his contry. And saying thus he role, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the affault. On thother fide also, the LACED EMONIANS with a maruelous corage & magnanimity, farre greater then their force heftirred them felues wonderfully to make refiftaunce, having their wines by them that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to geue meate & drinke nothem that needed, and did also withdrawe those that were hurt to cure them. The MACE-DONIANS likewise for their parte, endeuored them selues with all their might to fill vppe the menche with wodde and other thinges, which they cast vpon the dead bodies and armors; ly-Bing in the bottome of the ditche: & the LACED & MONIANS againe, labored all that they could noffible to let them. But in this great broyle, one perceived Pyrrus a horse backe to have lept the trenche, past ouer the strength of the cartes, and make force to enter into the city, Wherfore those that were appointed to defende that parte of the trench, cried out straight and the women fell a shreeking, and running, as if all had bene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further strikingdowne with his owne handes all that stoode before him, a CRETAN shot at him. & strake Processing his horfe through both fides: who leapinge out of the prease for paine of his wounde, dying, danger of his caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vppon the hanging of a steepe hill, where he was in great firege of Spardaunger to fall from the toppe. This put all his feruauntes and frendes about him in a maruelous feare, and therewithall the LACEDEMONIANS feeing them in this feare and trouble ran Cimmediatly vnto that place, and with force of shotte draue them all out of the trenche. After this retyre, Pyrrus caused all affault to cease, hoping the LACED EMONIANS in the end would weelde, confideringe there were many of them flaine in the two dayes past, and all the rest in maner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the citie (whether it were to proue the valliantnes of the inhabitantes them selues, or at the least to shew what power they were of euen in their greatest nede and distresse, when the LACED EMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTHE, one of king Antigonus Captaines with a great band of men. and put them into the city to aide them : and straight after him, as soone as he had entred, king King Atens Areus arrived also on thother side from CRETA, and two thowsand souldiers with him. So the arrived in women went home to their houses, makinge their reckening that they should not neede any Sparta with D more to trouble them selues with warres. They gaue the olde men liberty also to goe and rest them selves, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driven to arme them selues, and take weapon in hande: and in order of battell placed the newe come souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that newe supplies were come, grewe to greater stomake then before, and inforced all that he could, to winne the towne by affault. But in the end, when whis cost he founde that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the fiege, and went to poyleall the contry about, determining to lye there in garrison all the winter. He coulde not for all this auoide his destenie. For there rose a sedition in the city of ARGOS between two of Sedition in the chiefest citizens, Aristeas and Aristippus: and bicause Aristeas thought that kinge Antigo- the city of Armudid fauor his enemy Aristoppus, he made hast to sende first vnto Pyrrus, whose nature and god. E disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope vppon hope, euer taking the present prosperity, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loser, then he fought to recouer him felfe, and to restore his losse, by some other newe attempts. So that neither for being conqueror, nor ouercomen, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled fome, and him felfe also: by reason wherof, he sodainly departed towardes A a Gos. But king Pyrmu reput-Areus having layed ambushes for him in diverse places, and occupied also the straightest and sed from Sparhardest passages, by the which he was to passe: gaue a charge vppon the GAVLES and Mo- 14 goeth to LOSSIANS, which were in the tayle of his army. Now, the selfe same day Pyrrus was warned Argon. by a Soothfayer, who facrificing had founde the liuer of the facrificed beaft infected: that it betokened the loffe of some most neere vnto him. But when he heard the noyse of the charge r geuen, he thought not of the forwarning of his Soothsayer, but commaunded his sonne to take his household servauntes with him, and to go thither: as he him selfe in the meane time with as great hast as he could, made the rest of his army marche, to get them quickely out of this daungerous way. The fraye was very hotte about Ptolomie Pyrrus fonne, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACED EMONTANS with whome he had to doe, led by a valliant Can taine called Enaleus. But as he fought valliantly against those that stoode before him, there was a souldier of CRETA called Orasia, borne in the citie of APTERA, a man very ready of his hande, and light of foote, who running alongest by him, strake him such a blowe on his fide that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being flaine, his company began straight to flie: and the LACEDE MONIANS followed the chase so hottely, that they tooken heede of them selues, vntill they sawe they were in the plaine field farre from their footenen Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his fonne was newly reported, being a fire with forow and passion, turned sodainly vpon them with the men of armes of the Molossians. and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruelous slaughter among them. For, not 1 withstanding that enery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, having his fword in his hande : yet then he did shewe more proofe of his valliantnes, strength, and corage, then he had euer done before. And when he had fette spurres to his horse against Eud. em to close with him, Engless turned on the toe side, and gaue Pyrrus such a blowe with his fword, that he miffed litle the cutting of his bridle hande: for he cut in deede all the raines of the bridle a funder. But Pyrrus straight ranne him through the body with his speare, and light Pirrus flue ting of from his horse, he put all the troupe of the LACED & MONIANS to the sword that were about the body of Enalcus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cause of that losse vnto their contry for nothing, considering that the warres against the were ended. But Pyrrus having now as it were made facrifice of these poore bodies of the LACE O DEMONIANS, for the foule of his dead sonne, and fought thus wonderfully also to honorhis funeralls, converting a great parte of his forow for his death, into anger and wrath against the enemies: he afterwardes held on his way directly towardes Argos. And understanding that king Antigonus had already feafed the hills that were ouer the valley, he lodged neere vntothe city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following sent a heraulde vnto Antigonus, and gave him defyance, calling him wicked man, and chalenged him to come downe into the valleym fight with him, to trye which of them two thould be king. Antigonus made him aunswer, that he made warres as much with time, as with weapon: & furthermore, that if Pyrrus wetewary of his life, he had wayes open enough to put him selfe to death. The citizens of A Roosalforent Ambassadors vinto them both, to pray them to departe, sith they knew that there was nothing for them to see in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a newter, & freed vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, and gaue them his sonne for hostage. Pyrrus also made the fayer promise to do so too, but bicause he gaue no caution nor sufficient pledge to performe it, they mistrustred him the more. Then there fel out many great & wonderful tokens, as wel vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus having facrificed oxen, their heads Privadeath, being striken of from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and licked up their owne blood. And within the city of An Go s, a fifter of the temple of Apollo Lycias, called Apollonia, ranne through the streetes, crying out that she saw the city full of murder, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fraye, howbeit she vanished away sodainly, and no body knewe what became of her. Pyrrus then comminge hard to the walles of Argos in the E night, & finding one of the gates called Diamperes, opened by Ariftess, he put in his Gaves: who possessed the market place, before the citizens knew any thing of it. But bicause the gate in the city of was too low to passe the elephantes through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them of, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the carke, & in tumulte: by reason whereof they lost much time, so that the citizens in the ende perceived it, Aspides, the and ran incontinently vnto the castell of Aspides, and into other strong places of the city. And castell in Ar- therewithall, they sent with present speede vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and so he did: and after he was come hard to the walles, he remained without with the skowtes; & in the meane time fent his sonne with his chiefest Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good fouldiers and men of warre with them. At the same time allo F arrived Areus, king of Sparta, with a thowfand of the Cretans, and most lusty Spartans all which ioyning together, came to geue a charge vpo the GAVLES that were in the market

A place, who put them in a maruelous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that fide also of the circ called Cylarabis, with terrible noyfe & cries: when he vnderstoode that the GAVLE saunswered him not lustely and coragiously, he doubted straight that it was the voyce of men distresfed, and that had their handes full. Wherefore, he came on with speede to relieue them, thrufling the horsemen forwards that marched before him, with great daunger and paine, by reafon of holes, and finckes, and water conduites, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongest them, as may be thought fightinge by night, where no man faw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commaunded, by reason of the great novie they made, straying here and there up and downe the streetes, thene scattered from the othermeither could the Captaines fet their men in order, as wel for the darkenes of the night? as allo for the confused tumult that was all the city ouer, & for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both fides without doing any thing, looking for day light at the dawning wherof, Pyrrus perceived the castel of Aspides, ful of his armed enemies? And furthermore, Todainly as he was come into the market place, amogest many other good wcommon workes lette out to beautifie the same, he spied the images of a bull and a woulfe Abut and in copper, the which fought one with an other. This fight made him afrayed, bicaufe at that "wife in coperation he remembred a prophecy that had been tolde him that his good and down thould be for fee up in present he remembred a prophecy that had bene tolde him, that his end and death should be; the wif if when he sawe a woulfe and a bull fight together. The ARGIVES reporte, that these images of the were let vp in the market place, for the remembraunce of a certaine chaunce that had happe a ting weether. nedin their contrie. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pramia (as one C would fay, land fowen with corne) in the contry of THYREATIDE, he faw as he went, a would Danau wan fight with a bull : whereupon he stayed to see what the end of their fight would come to, sups the cay of poing the case in him selfe, that the woulfewas of his side, bicause that being a straunger as Argus from hewas, he came to fet vppon the naturall inhabitantes of the contry. The woulfe in the ende obtained the victory : wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycias, followed on his Apollo Lycias. enterprife, & had fo good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was, Gelanor hing king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the woulse of the Argives. and bull were fet vp in the market place of Ar gos. Pyrrus being halfe discoraged with the ight of them, and also bicause nothinge fell out well according to his expectacion, thought beltto retyre: but fearing the straitenesse of the gates of the city, he sent unto his some Hele-D mus, whome he had left without the city with the greatest parte of his force and army, comid Helmus Pyrmaunding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall that his men might the more readily get out? " " nnt. and that he might receive them, if their enemies by chaunce did hinder their comming out? But the messenger whom he sent, was so hasty and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled hish ingoing out, that he did not well understand what Pyrrus fayd unto him, but reported his mest hige quite contrary. Whereuppon the young prince Helenus taking the belt with his had with him, and the rest of his elephantes, entred into the city to helpe his father living was no wi gening backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retyring still; bevalidly repulledthose that set upon him, turning his face oft unto them. But when he was driven in the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the city, he was kept inwith his owne E menthat entered at the fame gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Fyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noyle was fo great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behinde, and did fill thrush forward into the prease, didnot permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the elephantes by missortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grindinge his teeth did hinder those also, that would have comen out and geven backe. Furthermore, an other of the elephantes that were entred before into the city, called Nicon(as much to fay, as conquering) feeking his gouernor that was striken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes : ran vpon the that The strange came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing frendes and foes one in an others necke, til at the length lone of an Ehauing founde the body of his master staine, he lift him up from the ground with his troncke, lephane to his and carying him vpon his two tuthes, returned backe with great fury, treading all vnder feete he found in his way. Thus every man being thronged and crowded vp together in this forte, there was not one that could helpe him felfe: for it feemed to be a maffe and heape of a multi-

Wherefore Pyrrus seeing his people thus troubled and harried to & fm tooke his crowne from his heade which he ware apon his helmet, that made him knowend his men a farre of, and gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and truffine then to the goodnes of his horse, flewe vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pyke, but the wound was neither daungerous nor great: wherfore Prove fet vpon him that had hurt him, who was an Argian borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore olde womans fonne, whose mother at that present time was gotten vp to the toppeof the tyles of a house, as all other women of the city were, to see the fight. And she perceium

Vntill at the last there came one Zopyrus, that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other fouldiers also that ran straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, cum as he was comming againe to him selfe out of this traunse. This Zopyrus drewe out a Slavon fword he wore by his fide, to strike of his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grimme countenancem

T is not knowen what was the third name of Caim Marim, no more then of Quintim Sertorius, who had all Spayne in his handes at one Lime: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the citie of Co-RINTHE. For this name of Achaicus, that was genen vnto Mummius, of the name of Africanus vnto Scipio: and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all of the Rose furnames geuen them, by reason of the conquestes they wan. By this reason Posidonius thinketh to ouercome them that say, that the third name the Romaines have, istheir proper name as Camillus, Mar-

Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many curtefies and pleasures. But specially one day aboue the rest, having made him suppe with him at his table, some one after supperful ling in talke of Captaines that were in Rome at that time: one that stoode by Scipio, askedhim (either bicause in deede he stoode in doubt, or else for that he would curry fauor with semin what other Captaine the Romaines should have after his death, like vnto him. Well, it fortuned so, that these words of Scipio (by reporte) aboue all things elsew Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene spoken by the oracle of some god, and madelim ! bold to deale in matters of state and common wealth: where, by meanes of the fattor & comrenaunce Cacilius Metellus gaue him (whose house his father and he had alwayes followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneshippe. In this office he preferred a law touching the manner howe to geue the voyces in election of the Magistrates, which did seeme tout from the nobility the authority they had in judgement. And therefore the Confull Cottalion ped vp against it, and perswaded the Senate to result that lawe, and not suffer it to be auto rised, and therewithall presently to call Marius before them to yeld areason of his doing so was it agreed uppon in the Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abalia at any thing, as fome other young man would have bene, that had but newly begonne to the into the world as he did, and having no other notable calling or quality in him, faving his we E tue only to commend him: but taking boldenes of him selfe (as the noble actes he afterwards did, gaueshow of his valor) he openly threatned the Consull Costa to sende him to prisons he did not presently withdrawe the conclusion he had caused to be resoluted apon. The Confull then turning him selfe vnto Cecilius Metellus, asked him how he liked it ? Metellus standing vp, spake in the behalfe of the Consult: and then Marius calling a sergeaunt out, command ded him to take Metellus selfe, and to cary him to prison. Metellus appealed to the other libunes, but never a one would take his matter in hand: fo that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the conclusion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honor into the market place among the affembly of the people, caused this laws passe and be authorised: and enery man held opinion of him that he would prove a stowerms F and fuch a one, as would not house for any feare, nor thrinke for bathfullnes, but would bent the Senate in fauor of the people. The judges received his aunswere, and allowed thereof. But D Marius spake against it, alleaging, that since he had received this honor to beare office in the common wealth, he was now growen from this base condicion, to be any more a follower of anyman: the which was not true in all. For every office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his posterity, to be vider the patronage of an other, nor doth difcharge him from the ducty of honoring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which thelaw doth permit to sit in the crooked chayer called Curulis, that is to say, caried uppon a charet through the city. chiefest man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reason of that allyance between them, seemed A in some thinges to followe Marius, as we have wrytten in his life. Marius was a man of great temperaunce and pacience, as may be judged by an acte he did, puttinge him felfe into the handes of furgeons. For his shanckes and legges were full of great swollen veynes, and being angrie bicause it was no pleasaunt thinge to beholde : he determined to put him selse into the handes of furgeons to becured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the surgeons worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in the like case: but paciently abode all the extreame paines a man must of necessity seele being cut, without sturring, groning, or sighing ftill keeping his countenaunce, and fayed neuer a word. But when the furgeon had done with his first legge, and would have gone to the other, he would not geue it him: nay fayd he J fee the cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwardes, Cacilius Metellus the Consull, be ! ing appointed to go into A FRICKE to make warre with king Ingurthe, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenauntes. Marius being there, seeing notable good service to be done, and rellus Lieuse- good occasion to shew his manhoode, was not of minde in this voyage to increase Metellus honor and reputacion, as other Lieutenauntes did : and thought that it was not Metelly that called him forth for his Lieutenaunt, but fortune her felfe that prefented him a fit occasionto raife him to greatnes, and (as it were) did lead him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he coulde doe. And for this cause therefore, he endeuored him selsen shew all the possible proofes of valliantnesse and honor he could. For, the warres being great continually there, he neuer for feare refused any attempt or service, how daungerous or painfull soeuer it were, neither disdained to take any service in hand, were it neuer so litle: buter-0 ceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wifedome and forefight, in that which was to be done, and striuing with the meanest fouldiers in living hardly and painefully, wannethe goodwill and fauor of euery man. For to fay truely, it is a great comforte & refreshing to soul diers that labor, to have companios that labor willingly with them. For they thinke, that their company laboring with them, doth in manner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the Romaine souldier maruelously to see the Generall eate openly of The laborar & the same bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that him selfe is the lift man to fet his hande to any worke when a trenche is to be cast, or their campeto be fortified, she Generall For they doe not so much esteeme the Captaines, that honor and reward them : as they doe those that in daungerous attempts labor, and venture their lines with them. And further they works willing- do farre better love them that take paines with them, then those that suffer them to live idlely by them. Marius performing all this and winning thereby the loue and goodwills of his fouldiers: he straight filled all LIBYA and the city of ROME with his glory, so that he was in every manns mouth. For they that were in the campe in Africke, wrote vnto them that were it Rome, that they should neuer see the ende of these warres against this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and chose him Consull. These thinges misliked Metellus very much, but specially the misfortune that came apon Turpilius, did maruelously trouble him: which fell out in this forte. Turpilius was Metellus frende, yea he and all his parentes had followed Metellus in this warre, being master of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernor ouer the city of V ACCA, a goodly great city: and he vsing the inhabitantes of the sion & death. fame very gently and curteoufly, mistrusted nothing, till he was fallen into the handes of hise nemies through their treason. For they had brought king lugarthe into their city vnknowing to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the king, and let him goe his way fafe. And this was the cause why they accused Turpilius of treason. Marius being one of his judges in the counfell, was not contented to be bitter to him him felfe, but moved many of the counfell besides to be against him. So that Metellus hy the voyces of the people, was driven against his will to condemne him, to suffer as a traitor: and shortly after it was found, and proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned, and put to death. To fay truely, there was not one of the cousel but were very fory with Metellus, who maruelous impaciently took

And they fay, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, fayd vnto him:O good man, thou wilt leauevs then, and returne to Rome to sue for the Consulfhippe, and canst thou not be contented to tary to be Consull with my fonne? Now his fonne at that time was but a boy. But whatfocuer the matter ment, Marius left him not fo, but labored for leaue all he could possible. And Metellus after he had vsed many delayes and excuses, at the length gaue him leave, twelve dayes only before the day of election of the Confulls. Wherefore Marius made hast, and in two dayes and a night came from the campe to Vtica apon the sea side, which is a maruelous way from it: and there before he tooke shippe, did sacrifice vnto the goddes, and the Sooth sayer tolde him; that the goddes by the fignes of his facrifices, did promise him vncredible prosperity, and so great; as he himselfe durst not hope after. These wordes made Marius hart greater. Whereupon he hoysed sayle, and having a passing good gale of winde in the poope of the shippe, passed the seasin foure dayes, and being landed, rode poste to Rome. When he was arrived, he went to shewe him felfevnto the people: who were maruelous desirous to see him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accusations which he obiected against Metellus, in the end he befought the people to choose him Confull, promising that within few dayes he would either kill, or take king lugurthe prisoner, Whereupon he was chosen Confull without any contradiction. And so soone as he was proclaimed, he beganne Manitus first immediatly to leavie men of warre, causing many poore men that had nothing, & many slaues time of being also, to be enrolled against the order of auncient custome: where other Captaines before him C did receiue no fuch maner of men, and did no more fuffer vnworthy men to be fouldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goodes behinde them, as a pledge of their good service abroade in the warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his stowte prowde wordes, full of contempt of others, that did chiefely offende the Mainteffernoble men in the city. For he proclaimed it euery where abroade as it were, that his Confull-ded the nobithippe was a spoyle he had gotten of the effeminate riche noble men through his valliantnes, his and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for service of the common wealth, and not themonuments of the dead, nor the images and statues of others, were those that recommended him to the people, nor weare his strength. And ofttimes naming Albinus, and otherwhile D Bestia, both noble men, and of great houses, who having bene Generalls of the ROMAINE army, had very ill fortune in the contry of LIBYA: he called them cowardes, and simple souldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their auncesters would rather have wished to have left their children that came of them like vnto him selse, then such as they had bene: confidering that they them selues had wonne honor and glory, not for that they were discended of noble blood, but through their desertued vertue and valliant deedes. Now Marius spake not these wordes in a foolishe brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the nobility for nothing: but the common people being very glad to see him shame and despite the Senate, and measuring alwayes the greatnes of his cotage with his lawty fierce wordes, they egged him forward still not to spare the nobility, and to reproue the greatmen, so that he euer held with the communalty. And furthermore, when he was passed one againe into A FRICK E, it spited Metellus to the hart, bicause that he having ended all the Marine dewarte, that there remained almost no more to take or winne, Marius should come in that forte primed Meto takeaway the glory and triumphe out of his handes, having fought to rife and increase by tellus of the unthankefullnes towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went an other way, quering of and left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenauntes, to deliuer the fame vnto him. How-king lagarate. beit the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the ende vpon Marius owne necke. For Sylla tooke out of Marius hands, the honor of ending this warre: euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. Buthow, & after what forte, I will repeate it in few words, bicause we have written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father Bocchus kinge inlaw vnto king Ingurthe, vnto whom he gaue no great aide, whilest he made warres with the of Numidae, ROMAINE s, bicause he hated his vnfaithfullnes, & feared least he would make him selfe grea- delinereth in-place, he was constrained of very necessity to cast his last hope and ancker apon him, as his fi. A nall refuge, and fo repayre vnto him. King Bocchus received him rather for shame, bicause he durst not punish him, then for any loue or goodwill he bare him: and having him in his hands feemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and fecretly to wryte the contrary vnto him, Butin the meane time, he practifed treaton under hande, and fent princly for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæstor (to say, high treasorer) vnder Marius, and of whome he had received certains pleasures in those warres. Sylla trusting to this barbarous king, went at his sending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promife, and altered his minde flanding many dayes in doubt with him felfe howe to refolue, whether he should deliver king he gurthe, or keepe Sylla him felfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended trea-The original 10n, and delivered king Ingurthe alive into Syllaes hands. And this was the first original cause of the pestilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwardes betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to have veterly overthrowen the citie of Rome, and to have rased the foundation of the rius and Sylla, empyre vnto the grounde. For many enuvinge the glorie of Marius, gaue it out every where that this acte of the taking of king Iugurthe, appertained only vnto Sylla : and Sylla him felfe caufed a ring to be made, which he ware comonly, and had grauen vpon the stone of the same. how Bocchus delivered Ingurthe into his handes. And afterwardes he made it allwayes his feele to dispite Marius with all, who was an ambitious and proude man, and coulde abide no companion to be partaker of the glorie of his doings: and Sylla did it specially at the procurement of enemies & ill willers, who gaue the glory of the beginning & chiefe exployts of this warre, vnto Metellus, and the last and finall conclusion vnto Sylla, to the ende that the people should (not have Marius in so great estimacion and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuy, detraction, and hatred against Marius, was soone after extinguished and troden vider foote, by reason of the great daunger that fell apon all ITALIE out of the West: and they neuer spake of it afterwardes, knowing that the common wealth stoode in neede of a good Captaine, and that they beganne to looke about, and confider who should be that great wisePvlot, that might faue and preferue it, from so exceding daungerous storme of warres. For there was not a noble man of all the auncient houses of Rome, that durst vindertake to offer him selfe to demaunde the Consullshippe: but Marius being absent, was chosen Consull the & cond time. For Iugurthe was no fooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the coming downe The comming of the TEVTONS, and of the CIMBRES, the which would not be beleued at the first, by reason D of the infinite number of the fighting men which was fayd to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of armies which was instified to come also: but afterwardes they knew plainely, that the rumor that ranne abroade was leffe, then the troth fell out indeede. For they were three hundred thow and fighting men all armed, who brought with them also an other multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandered vp and downe feeking contries and townes to dwell and line in, as they heard fay the GAV LES had done in olde time, who leaving their owne contry, came, and had possessed the best parte of I TALLE, which they had taken away from the Thus cans. Now to fay truely, no man knewe of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no frendshippewish any other people, as also bicause they came out of a farre contry, as a clowde of peoplettat E was spred all ouer GAVLE & ITALIE. It was douted much that they came out of GERMANYS, dwelling about the north fea: and this they coniectured by viewe of the greatnes of therbodies, and also for that they had darke blew eyes and redde, besides that the GERMANES in their tongue doe call theeues and robbers, Cimbri. Other fay that Celtica, for the great length and largenes of the contry, firetching it selfe from the coast of the great Occean sea and from the north partes, drawing towards the marifles Moeotides, and the Eastrunneth into Sc YTHIA or TARTARIAP ONTIC A: and that for neighbourhood these two nations ioyned together, and went out of their contrie, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many fundry times, marching yearely in the spring further and further into the contry. And thusby continuance of time, they passed by force of armes through all the firme lande of Evrops I and that for this cause, although they had many particular names according to the divertite of their nations, yet all this maffe and multitude of people gathered together, were called

A notwithstanding, the army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would say, the CELTOTARTA-RES. Other hold opinion that the nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were known in old time Cimentific for auncient GREECIANS, the one parte of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being fled (or driven out of their contrie for some civill diffention) were compelled by the TARTARES to passe beyond the marisses Moeotides, into the contries of Asia, under the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the residue of them which were a farre oreater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furdest partes of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Occean sea, in a darke shadowed contrie, couered with wonderfull forreftes, of fuch length, and fo great and thicke, and the trees fo high, that the funne can have no power vpon the ground, and they joyne hard vpon the great forrest of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder such a climate, where the pole is of such a height by the inclination of the circles equidiftant, which they call Parallelles, that it is not farre from the poynte that aunswereth directly to the plummet uppon the head of the inhabitantes : and where the daves are equinoctiall, they doe deuide all their time in two partes, the which geneth Homer occasion to fayne, that when Vliffes would call vpon the dead, he went into the contry of the CIMMERIANS, as into the contry of hell. And this is the cause why they say these barbarous people left their owne contries to come into ITALIE, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwardes they fay (and not without great likely hoode) that they were furnamed CIMBRES: howebeit that is spoken rather by a likely conjecture, then by any assured troth of history. And as for the multitude of men, the most parte of historiographers doe C wryte, that they were rather moe, then leffe then we have spoken of : and that they were so hardy and valliant, that nothing coulde stande before them, they did so great thinges by the ftrength of their handes where they fought with any, so violently, and so sodainely, that they feemed to be like a lightninge fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they mer with no man that durft refiff them, but scraped together and carried away, all that they found, hande ouer head: and there were many Romaine Captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyonde the mountaines, who with great armies were shamefully ouerthrowed by them. The cowardlynes of those, whom they had ouercome. was the chiefest cause that moued them to direct their iorney to Rome. For when they had vanquished the first they fought withall, and gotten great richesse also: they were so sleshed D by this, that they determined to stay no where before they had first destroyed Rome, & sacked all ITALIE. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all partes, fent for Marius to geue him the conduction and leading of these warres, and chose him Consult the seconde time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the lawe, that did expressely forbid any man to be chosen for forbid. being absent, and vntill also a certaine time appointed had past between the vacation and ele- the second ction, before they could choose him officer twise in one office. Some alleaged this law, of intent to hinder the election. But the people repulst them, objecting to the contrary: that this was not the first time the law had genen place to the benefit of the common wealth, and that Law mass give the occasion offered to abrogate the law at that present was no lesse, then former occasions by place for comthe which they chose Scipio Consull, against the course and time appointed by the law, not for mon benefit. any feare they stoode in to lose their owne contrie, but for the desire they had to destroy the contry of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his armie againe out of LIBYA into ITALIB, tooke possession of his Consulship the first day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES beginne their yeare)and therwithall made his triumphe into the city of Rome, showing that to the Romaine sy, which they thought neuerto haue seene : and that was, kinge Iugurthe prisoner, who was so subtill a sample into man, and coulde fo well frame him selfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and subtiltie was Rome, for king offo great corage besides, that none of his enemies ever hoped to have had him alive. But it lugarithe. is fayd, that after he was led in this triumphe, he fell mad straight apon it. And the pompe of triumphe being ended, he was carred into prisone, where the sergeauntes for hast to have the F spoyle of him, tare his apparell by force from of his backe: and bicause they would take away his rich golde eare ringes that hong at his eares, they pulled away with them the typpe of his eare, and then cast him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wittes being altogether

your stoues. He lived there yet six dayes, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwayes to prelong his miserable life vnto the last hower: the which was a just deserved punishment for his wicked life. In this triumphe were caried (as they fay) three thow fand & feuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of filuer nygots, fine thow and fenen hundred and lxxv. pounde weight and more in golde and ready coyne, eight and twenty thowfand and feuen hundred crowner After this triumphe, Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he en tred into the companie with his triumphinge robe, either bicause he forgot it, or else of too groffe and vnciuill arrogancy: but perceiuing that all the affemblie misliked of it, he roleful dainly, and tooke his long Confulls gowne, and then returned quickely againe into his place Furthermore Marius departing to goe to the warres, thought to traine his army by the warres and to harden his fouldiers vnto labor, caufing them to runne every way, making great long iorneys, compelling ech fouldier to cary his owne furniture, and to prepare him necessary tells to finde him felfe withall: fo that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, and called fuch se were paineful and willing to do that which they were commaunded without grudging care rius moyles. Other notwithstanding, do shew an other cause and beginning of this prouetbe For they fay, that Scipio lying at the fiege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not only take view of the armor and horses of seruice that werein his armie, but also of the moyles and other beastes of burden, bicause he would see how they were kept & furnished. So Marius brought his horse and moyle to the muster which he kept him selfe, fatte, fayer, and very well dret and his moyles heare so slike and smooth, and therewith all so lusty and trimme, as none of the rest were like vnto them. Scipio tooke great pleasure to see these beastes so well kept, and in so good plyte: infomuch as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words this manner of talke was taken up euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painefull, and genen to fore labor, makinge as though the would praise him, they call him Marius moyle. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these barbarous people (like in force to the beating backe of the raging feaes) turned their first fury towardes SPAYNE : and that he in the meane space had time and leafure to traine and exercise his souldiers, to make them bolde, and withall, him selfe to be throughly knowen amongest them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend nor disobey: then they found his rough commaunding, and sharpe seuerity in punishing such as flacke their duety, both profitable and very necessarie, besides that it was also instandred sonable. Againe, his great fury, his sharpe words, and his fierce lookes, after they had a while bene vied to them, by litle and litle they feemed nothinge to fearfull to them, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleased the souldiers more then all the rest, was his instice acd veright dealinge: whereof they reporte such an example: Marius had a nephewe of his inhis campe called Caius Lustus, who had charge of men in the army. This Lustus was taken for a maruelous honest man, saving that he had this fowle vice in him, that he would be sodainly in loue with fayer young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trimme younge striplinge, called Trebonius, that serued vnder him, and having many times lewdly entifed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpose, at the last sent for him one night by his servaunt. The young man might not disobay his Captaine being sent for, but presently went vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did strine with all his force to doe him villanny: he drewe out his fworde, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe:who so soone as he returned, caused the marshall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himfelfe, & to name many witnesses, who had both seene & knowen how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonor, and how that he had continually refifted his abhominable motion, and would neveryeld him felfe vnto him, for any gift or prefent he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vsed to bege s uen to them that in a day of battel haue done some valliant deede, and he him selfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble acte, and at fuch a time, as good and honelt

CAIVS MARIVS. A examples were requisite. This judgement of Marius beinge caried to Rome, stoode him to great good purpole towardes the obtaining of his third Confulthippe: besides also that they Maring third looked for the comming backe of these barbarous people about the springe with whome the ROMAINE fouldiers would not fight under any other Captaine, then Marius, Howbeit they came not fo soone againe as they looked for them, but Marius passed ouer also the yeare of his third Confullshippe. So time comming about againe for the election of newe Confulls, and his companion also being dead: he was driven to goe him selfe vnto Rome, leaving the charge of his campe in his absence, vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many no- liu Lieutblemen that fued for the Confulthippe: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had man: of the the communalty vnder his girdell as he would him felfe, more then any of thother Tribunes, Maniat. B and being wonne under hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perfwaded the Lucius Samepeople to choose Marius Consult the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse ninus Triit faying that he would none of it, though the people choice him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traitor, crying out, that his refufall in fuch a daunger and time of neceffity, was an apparant parte to betray the common wealth. It was found straight that this was a groffe packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by fuch as could fee day at a litle hole. Neuertheleffe, the people confidering that their prefent troubles required Marius skil & good fortune in the warres, they made him Confull the fourth time, and joyned Catulus Luctatius Conful with him, a man Marine that was greatly honored of the nobility, and not milliked also of the common people. Marius fourth Conhauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great full bipper C speede, & fortifying his campe by the river of Rhone, he brought great provision of all kindes Latterius. of vittels thither with him, least being straighted by lacke therof, he should be forced to come Rodamus st. to battell at any other time, but even as he would him felfe, and as it should feeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of vittells vnto his campe by sea was very long, and daungerous, and a maruelous great charge besides : he made it very shorte and easie by this meanes. The mouth of the river of Rhone had gathered together so much mudde, and fuch store of sande, which the waves of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was becomen very high and depe: so as the banckes made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and daungerous for great shippes of burden that came from the sea. Marius considering this matter, set his men a worke while they had nothing to do, & made them digge a large trench

D and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great parte of the river, and caried it to a conbragging defiaces, but kept his men together within his campe, taking on terribly with them that would rashely take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impa-

one after an other to behold the enemies, & to acquaint them selues with fight of their faces A their countenaunce, and marching, & not to be afrayed of their voyces to heare them fresh which were wonderfull, both straunge & beaftly : and also that they might know the facional their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order & ordinary viewing of them. in time he made the things that femed fearefull vnto his men at the first fight, to be afterward very familiar: fo that they made no more wondring at them. For he judged, the thing which in deede is true, that a rare and new matter neuer seene before, for lacke of judgement and vn. derstanding, maketh things vnknowen to vs, more horrible & fearefull the they are: and to the contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare, & terror of those things, which he nature are in deede fearefull. The which was feene then by experience. For they being dayly acquainted to looke vpon these barbarous people, it did not only diminish some parte of the R former feare of the ROMAINE fouldiers: but furthermore they whetting their choller with the fierce vntollerable threates and bragges of these barbarous brutish people, did set their harns a fire to fight with them, bicause they did not only wast and destroy all the contry about them. but besides that came to geue assault euen vnto their campe with such a boldnes, that the Ro-MAINE fouldiers could no lenger fuffer them, and they letted not to speake wordes that came to Marius eares him felfe. What cowardlines hath Marius ener knowen in vs., that he keepes vs thus from fighting, & vnder locke & key as it were, in the gard of porters, as if we were women? Let vs therefore shew our selues like men, & go aske him if he looke for any other souldiers besides our selves to defend I TALIE: and if he have determined to employ vs as pioners onely, when he would cast a trenche to ridde away the mudde, or to turne a river contrary. For therein hath he onely hitherunto employed vs in great labor, and they are the notable works he hath done in his two Confullshippes, whereof he maketh his boast vnto them at Rome, Is he afrayed they should take him, as they did Carbo & Capio, whom the enemies have overthrowen? He must not be asrayed of that: for he is a Captaine of another manner of valor andrepuracion then they were, and his army much better then theirs was. But howefoeuer it be, yet were it much better in prouing to loofe something, then to be idle, & to suffer our frends and cofederats to be destroyed & sacked before our eyes. Marius was maruelous glad to hearehis men coplaine thus, & did comfort them, & told the that he did nothing mistrust their corage & valiantnes: howbeit that through the coulell of certaine prophecies & oracles of the gods. he did expect time & place fit for victory. For he euer caried a Syrian woma in a litter about h with him called Martha, with great reverence, whom they faid had the spirit of propheciein her: & that he did euer facrifice vnto the gods by her order, & at fuch time as fhe willed him to do it. This Syrian woman went first to speake with the Senate about these matters, and did foretell & prognosticate what should follow. But the Senate would not heare her, & made her to be drive away. Wherupon she went vnto the wome, & made the see proofe of some things shevauted of, & specially Marius wife, at whose feete she was set one day in an affembly of the comon playes, to see swordplayers fight for life & death: for she told her certenly which of the should ouercome. Whereupon this Lady sent her vnto her husband Marius, who made great reckening of her,&caried her eue in a litter with him wherfoeuer he went. She was alwaies at The auter of Marius facrifices, apparelled in a gown of purple in graine, clasped to her with claspes, & held a speare in her hand would all about with no segayes, & garlands of flowers eved on with laces, time of facri-This maner of least made many dour whether Marius thewed this woman opely, beleuing in dede that the had the gift of prophecy: or els that knowing the cotrary, he made as thought did beleue it, to helpe her fayning. But that which Alexander the M YND IAN Wrote touching A monder of Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wodred at. For he faid there were two of the followed Marie in his warres, & that they euer shewed the selues & missed not, when he should win any great battel, & that they did know them by latin collers they ware about their necks, which the fouldiers had tyed about the, & afterwards let them go where they would: by reason wherof, they did know the fouldiers againe, & it femed also that they did falute the, & were very glad when they faw the, & perswaded the selues, that it was a signe & token of good lucke to follow. May ny fignes and tokens were feene before the battell: howbeit all the rest were ordinary sightes, fauing that which was reported to be seene at TVDERTVM,& AMERIA, two cities of ITALHE

A For they fay there were feene speares and targets in the night, but filing like fire in the element. which first were caried vp & downe here and there, and then met together eiten as men mone & flurre that fight one with an other: vntill at the length, the one gening backe, and the other followinge after, they all vanished away, and consumed towardes the West. About the selfe fame time also, there came from the citie of PESSINVNIA, Batabaces, the chiefe priest of the Batabaces the greatmother of the goddes, who brought newes, that the goddesse had spoken to him with priest of the inher fanctuary, and told him that the victory of this warre should fall out on the Romaine's godden. fide. The Senate beleued it, and ordained that they should build a temple vnto that goddesse, to geue her thankes for the victorie which she did promise them. Batabaces also would have nresented him selse vnto the people in open assemblie, to tell them as much. But there was B one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune that would not fuffer him to do it, calling him tombler, or nig- Aulus Pomler. & violently thrust him behinde the pulpit for orations : but the mischaunce that fell apon point Tri-Pompeius afterwards, made the the more to beleue Batabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune bune. no sooner came home vnto his house, but a great vehement agew tooke him, wherof he dyed theseuenth day after, as all the world could witnes. Now the TEVTONS perceiving that Marius stirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to affault him: how beit they were so well received with shorte and slinges, that after they had lost certaine of their men, they gave it ouer, and determined to goe further, perswading them selves that they might easily passe the Alpes without daunger. Wherfore truffing vp all their baggage, they paffed by Marine campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruelous great mule titude of people, by the length of time which they tooke to paffe their way. For it is fayd they The enemies were passing by his campe, sixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the campe were ROMAINES campe, they asked them in mockery, if they would wryte or fend home any thing remounts fixe to their wives, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all passed and there were gone, and that they continued on their iorney still, Marius also raised his campe, and went and followed them fayer and softly foote by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neere as he could, alwayes fortifying his campe very well, and euer choosing strong places of scituacion, & aduantage to lodge in, that they might be fafe in the night time. Thus they marched on in this forte, vntill they came vnto the city of AIX, from whence they had not farre to goe, but they entered straight into the mountaines of the Alpes. Wherefore Marius prepared nowe D to fight with them: & chose out a place that was very strong of scituacion to lodge his campe in, howebeit there lacked water. And they say he did it of purpose to the ende to quicken his mens corage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and tolde him that they should stande in great dannger to abide maruelous thirst if they lodged there. Whereinto he made aimswere thewing them the river that ranne hard by the enemies campe, faying withall, that they must go thither and buy drinke with their blood. The fouldiers replyed againe: and why then doe Mariu bolde ye not lead vs thither, whilest our blood is yet moyste? he gently aunswered them againe: bi- wordern his cause the first thing we doe, we must fortifie our campe. The fouldiers, though they were an fouldiers, and gry with him, yet they obeyed him : but the flaues having neither drinke for them felues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troupe of them, and went towardes the timer fome E of them carying axes, other hatchets, other fwords and speares, with their pottes to cary water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwise they could not come by it. A fewe of the barbarous people at the first fought with them, bicause the most parte of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were fill in the bathe washinge them selues, finding in that place many springes of hotte naturall bathes. Thus the ROMAINES foundemany of the barbarous people making emery, and taking their pleasure about these bathes, for the great delite they tooke to conder the pleasauntnes of the place but when they heard the noyle of them that fought, they beganne to runne one after an other visto the place from whence the noyle came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any lenger to keepe the ROMAINE fouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their flaues should r haue bene flaine of the barbarous people: and moreouer, bicaufe the vallianteff fouldiers of their enemies called the A MBRONS (who before had ouercome Manlius and Capio, two Ro-MAINE Captaines with their armies, and that made of them selves thirty thowsande fighting otherwise valliant and coragious fellowes, and more lively then they were wont to be, by rea. fon of the wine they had dronke. They ran not furiously to fight out of order, neither didther crie out confusedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noyse with their has nes all after one forte, they oft rehearled their owne name AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS which was, either to call one an other of them, or elfe to feare the ROMAINES with their name only. The ITALIANS also on thother side, being the first that came downero fight with them were the Ligvaians, dwelling vpon the coast of Genuoa, who hearing this noyse and cree of theirs, plainely understanding them: aunswered them againe with the like noyse and crye. LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, faying that it was the true furname of all their mation. And so before they joyned together, this crye was redoubled many a time on either side I and the Captaines of both partes made their fouldiers crye out all together, contending for enuy one against an other, who should crye it out lowdest. This contention of crying, inflamed the fouldiers corages the more. Now the Ambrons having the river to paffe, were by this meanes put out of order, and before they could put them selues in battell ray againe after they had passed the river, the Ligvalians ranne with great fury to set apon the formest and after them, (to aide the LIGVRIANS that had begon the charge) the ROMAINES them selves fell also apon the Amerons, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon these barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, and flie. So the greatest slaughter they made, fortuned uppon the bancke of the river, whereinto they thrust one an other in such forte, that all the river ran blood, being filled with dead bodies. And they o that could get ouer the river againe, and were on thother fide, durft not gather together zw more to fland to defence: fo as the ROMAINES flew them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their cariage. Then their women came out against them with swordes and axes in their handes, grinding their teeth: and crying outfor forrow and anger, they charged as well vpon their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chaled them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies. Furthermore, they thrust them selves amongest them that fought, & strove by force to plucke the ROMAINES targets out of their handes, and tooke holde of their naked fwordes bare handed, abiding with an inuincible corage to be hacked and mangled with their fwordes. And thus was the first battell geuen (as they say) by the rivers side, rather by channe vnlooked for then by any fet purpose, or through the generals counsel. Now the ROMAINES, D after they had ouercome the most parte of the AMBRONS, retyring backe by reason the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had geuen fuch an ouerthrow) ling fonges of victory and triumphe, nor make good chere in their tentes one with an other, and least of all sleepe: (which is the best & sweetest refreshing for men that have fought happely) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, bicause their campe was not trenched and fortified, and bicause they knewe also that there remained almost innumerable thow fandes of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: besides also, that the Au-BRONS that had fled and scaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with lowd cries, which were nothing like mens lamentacions and fighes, but rather like wilde beaftes bellowing and roaringe. So that the bellowing of fuch a great multitude of beaftly people, mingled E together with threates and waylinges, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running ituer to rebounde againe of the founde and ecco of their cries maruelously : by reason whereof, all the valley that lay betwene both, thundered to heare the horrible and fearefull trembling. This made the ROMAINE fouldiers afeard, and Marine him felfe in some doubt: bicause they looked to have benefought withall the fame night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithstanding, the barbarous people did not assault them that night, nor the next day following, but only prepared them selves vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there was about the place where they were camped, certaine caues and litle valleyes couered with wodde: he secretly sent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thowsand footemen well armed, and commaunded him to keepe close in ambushe, vntill he saw that the bar- F barous people were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set apon their receward. The refidue of his armie, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed them

A Glues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the fielde out of his force: where he pur them in order of battell, fending his horsemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmishe. The TEVTONS seeing them come, had not the pacience to tary till Marine sethe ROMAINES were come downe into the plaine fielde to fight without advantage, but are conde banell ming them selues in hast, and in a rage, ranne up the hill to the ROMAINES, where they stoods tone in battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, fent here and there was the prinate Captaines, charging them they should not stirre, and onely to temporise and forbeare, vntill the enemies came within a stones cast of them : and that they should then throw their dartes at them, and afterwardes drawe their swordes, and repulse the barbarous people with their fhieldes. For he did foresee before, that when they should clime vp against the hill (vppon the B hanging whereof the ROMAINES had fet their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and ranckes could stand close together to any effect or purpose: bicause they could not have fure footing, nor march affuredly, but would eafily be throwe backeward if they were neuer so litle repulsed, by reason of the hanging of the hill. Marins game this order vnto his folke and therewithall was him felfe the first man that put it in execution: for he was as tryimme a warriour, and as valliant a fouldier, as any man in all his army: befides, not one amongest them all would venter furder, and be more bolde then him selfe. So when the Ro-MAINES had refifted them, and stayed them sodainely, going with fury to have wonne the hill. perceiuing them selues to be repulsed, they gave backe by litle and litle, untill they came into the field: and then beganne the formest of them to gather together, and to put them selues in battell ray vppon the plaine, when fodainly they heard the noyfe and charging of them that were in the tayle of their army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occasion when it was offered him, bicause that the noyse of the first charge comming up against the hills thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambushe, gaue him aduertisement thereof; whereupon he caused his men presently to shew, and running with great cryes, came to gene a charge vpon those which were in the tayle of the barbarous people, putting the hindemost to the sworde.

They made their fellowes whose backes were next vnto them, to turne their faces & fo from man to man, till at the length, in shorte time all their battell beganne to wayer in disorder; and they made no great resistaunce, when they saw they were so charged before and behinde, but beganne straight to flie for life. The ROMAINES following them hard at the heeles, killed and Merine vitooke prisoners aboue a hundred thowsande of them, and tooke moreouer their cartes, their trusons and tentes and all their carriage. Which the whole army by confent agreed to prefent vnto Ma- Ambron. rius, excepting nothing, fauing that which was imbeaceled and conveyed away under hande. Now, though this was a maruelous honorable & right noble present yet they thought it not a recompence sufficient for that he had deserved, for the valure he had shewed of a famous Captaine in leading of his army, & for the good order he kept in this warre: so happy thought they them selues to have escaped so great a dayinger. Notwithstanding some wryters doe not agree, that the spoyle of the barbarous people was genen ynto Marius: northat there were also so great a number of men slaine as we have spoken of. But they say, that after this bartell the MARSSILIANS did inclose their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and confumed vpon the fieldes through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed fo fatte, and did foke the greafe fo deepe in the same, that the sommer following they did beare an uncredible quantity of all fortes of frutes. And by this meanes were Archilocus wordes proued true, that the errable land doth waxe fat with such rottennesse or putrification. And it is sayd aso, that of ordinary after great battells, there falleth great store of raine. Either it is by meane of some god that powring downe pure Much raine raine water doth purifie, wash, and clense the grounde, defiled and polluted with mans blood: followeth afor else it happeneth by naturall cause. For that the ouerthrow of so many dead bodies, and of selle, the blood spilt, engendreth a moyst, grosse, and heavy vapoure, which doth thicken the aver (that by nature is chaungeable, and easie to alter) from a very small or little beginning, vnto an exceeding great chaunge. After this battell, Marius caused the harnesse and spoyles of the barbarous people to be layed aside, that were left whole and fayer to fight, to be autific & en. rich the pompe of his triumphe. Then he caused the rest to be gathered together on a great

heape, and layed apon a stake of wodde, to make a noble facrifice vinto the gods, all his annual being armed about him, crowned with garlandes of triumphe, and him felfe apparelled in long gowne of purple, according to the custome of the Romaines in such a case, and holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he first lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning downe the torch to put fire to the stake of wood; they saw some of his frends a good way of horse backe, comming post vnto him: then sodamly there was a great silence made of all the affembly, euery man defirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted of their horses, they ranne straight to embrace Marus, and brought him newes that he was chosen Confull the fift time: and presented him the letters sent him from ROME confirming the same. And thus, this new joy falling out besides the victory, the primate fouldiers did thewe the great ioy and pleasure they tooke in both, with great showtes and be-R ting youn their harnesse; and the Captaines also, they crowned Marius againe with new garlandes of laurell which they put about his head, and that done, he put fire vinder the stake of woode, and ended his facrifice. But that which neuer fuffereth men quietly to enjoy the good happe of any victory clearely, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good be it either fortune or spight of fatall destenie, or else the necessitie of the naturall causes of earthly thinges: did shortely after this great toy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Confull, who was like a cloude in a fayer bright day, and brought the city of Rome agains into a new feare and trouble. For Gatulus that went against the Cin-BRES, thought it was not for him to keepe the straightes of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for passing: bicause that in so doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his o army into many partes, and had weakened him felfe very much if he had taken that course, Wherefore comming a litle on this fide the Alpes towardes ITALIE, he planted him felfevopon the river of Athelis, and built a bridge apon it to passe and repasse ouer his men when he would, and fette vp at either ende of the bridge two strong fortes well fortified, that he might more comodiously helpe the places on the other side of the river, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force the after they had gotten out of the straights of the mountaines. Now, these barbarous people had such a glory in them selues, and disdained their enemies to much that more to their force and boldnes, then of any necessity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they fuffred it to fnow apon them being starke naked, and did clime up to the toppe of the mountaines, throw great heapes of ife and fnow. And when they D were at the very toppe of all, they layed their long broad targets under their bodies, and lay all along apon them, fliding downe the fleepe high rockes, that had certaine hanginges out of an infinite height. In the ende, they came to campe neere vnto the ROMAINES by the riuer fide, and confidered howe they might paffe it ouer: and beganne to fill it vp, tearing downe (like gyants) great hilles of earth which they founde thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled up whole by the rootes, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, and whole towers of earth after them, to stoppe and breake the course of the river. But besides all this, they threw great tymber into the riuer, which being caried downe the streame, came with fuch a force, & hit against the postes of the bridge so violently, that they shaked the Ro-MATNES bridge marueloufly, Whereuppon many of the fouldiers of the great campe werea! I frayed, and forfaking it, beganne to retyre. But then did Catulus, like a perfit good Captaine showe, that he made leffe accompt of his owne private honor and estimacion, then he didof the generall honor of all his fouldiers. For, feeing that he could not perswade his men by any reason to tary, and that in this feare they dislodged in disorder against his will:he him selfe comaunded the standard bearer of the Eagle to marche on, and ranne to the foremest that went their way, and marched him felfe before them all, to the intent that the shame of this retyre should altogether light upon him, & not apon his contry, and that it might appeare the Ro-MAINES did follow their Captaine, and not flie away. The barbarous people therefore affaulting the force at the end of the bridge of the river of Athefis, tooke it, & all the men that were lives to the death for defence of their contry: the barbarous people letthem go vpon copolition, which they sware to kepe faithfully, by their bull of copper. This bull afterwards was taken

A when they loft the battell, and caried (as they fay) into Catulus Luctains house, as the chiefest thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the contry open without any defence, scattered here and there, and destroyed all where they came. Whereuppon the Ro-MAINES sent for Marins to Rome to goe against them: and after he was arrived, every man thought he shoulde haue entred in triumphe, bicause also the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not doe it, either bicause he would not depriue his fouldiers and the Captaines that had fought vnder him, of any parte of the honor that was due vnto them, they Marine isfiibeing absent : or bicause that he would warrant the people fro the present daunger they were sed to enter in in, by laying eafide the glory of his former victories, into the handes of the good fortune of triumphe. ROME, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwardes, by a more honorable and perfit confir-B mation of the second. Wherefore, after he had made an oration to the people, and Senate according to the time, he went his way immediatly towardes Catulus Luctatius, whose comming Marins goth didcomforte him much: and fent also for his army that was yet in GAVLE beyond the moun- towardes Cataines. And after his army was come, he passed the river of Po, to kepe the barbarous people thus to helpe from hurting ITALIE on this fide the Po. Now, the CIMBRES still deterred to gene battell bi- him. cause they looked for the TEVTONS, and sayd: that they marueled much what they ment to Postus tary fo long: either bicause they knewe not in deede of their ouerthrowe, or else for that they would not feeme to knowe it, bicause they handeled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deathes. At the length, they fent vnto Marius to aske him landes and townes fufficient, to kepe them and their brethren. Marin asked their Ambassadors what brethren they ment. C They aunswered, that they were the TEVTONS. Whereat the standers by beganne to laugh: and Marins finely mocked them, faying. Care not for those brethren fayd he, for we have geuen them ground enough, which they will kepe for euer. These Ambassadors found his mock Marine mocke Straight, and beganne to reuile and threaten him, that the CIMBRES shoulde presently make to the Cimhim repent it, and the Tevrons foloone as they arrived. Why, fayd Marius vnto them a- bres. gaine, they are come already: and there were no honefty in you, if you could goe your way & not salute them, since they are your brethren. And as he spake these wordes, he commaunded his men to bring him the kinges of the TEVTONS bounde and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQVANI. The CIMBRES understäding this by reporte of their Ambassadors, presently marched towardes Marius, who stirred not at all, but The Combres only fortified and kept his campe. They fay that it was for this battell that Marius first innen-march against ted the newe denife he brought in for the darte which the Romaines were wont alwayes to put a litle thinne pinne of wodde, easie to be broken, in place of the same, making it crastely, to the end that when the darte was throwen, & stucke in the enemies target, it should not stand right forward, but bow downewards towardes the iron, that the wodden pinne being broken, the staffe of the darte should hang downewardes, holding yet by the iron pinne running quite for battell, that they might trye it out, who should be owners of the contry. Whereunto Ma-rimmade aunswer, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to counsell with their enemies, of the time and place when they (hould geue battell : but neuertheleffe, he would not flicke to pleasure the CIMBRES so much. And thus they agreed between them, that it should be the thirde day following, in the plaine of Verfelles, which was very commodious for the horsemen of the Romaines: and also for the barbarous people to put our at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Confull, had throwe against the enemies at the first charge. For before, the staffe of the datte was fastned for alteringe vnto the iron, and the iron vnto the staffe, with two litle iron pinnes that passed through the the date in woodde and then Marius left one of the iron pinnes as it was before, & taking away the other, fight.

in his campe twenty thowfand, and three hundred fouldiers: and Marins had in his campe two Two and fiftie and thirty thowsand fighting men, which he placed in the two winges of the battell, shutting three handred in Catalus with his men in the middeft. As Sylla writeth it, who was prefent at the fame: faying, men between that Maries did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrowe his enemies with the two Maries and winges of the battell, to the end that the whole victory should light apon his two winges, and A that Catulus & his men in the middelt should have no parte therof. For he could not so much as fronte the enemy, bicause that commonly when the fronte of a battell is of such a bredthe the two winges are ever stretched out before, and is made like the cressant of a moone, where the middest is thickest and fardest in. And it is wrytten also in other stories, that Catulus him felfe accusing the malice of Marius, bicause he did so : spake it to excuse his owne dishonor. The band of As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footemen comming out of their fortes leafurely did put them selues into a squadron, as broade as long, for in every side they occupied almost thirty furlong: but their horsemen which were fifteene thowsande, marched before in summ. tuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heades facioned like wilde beaftes neckes, and straunge beuers or buffes to the same, & ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, a as they had bene winges: which to fight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curafes on their backes, and caried great white targets he fore them : and for weapons offensive, every man had two dartes in his hand to bestow a fame of, & when they came to hand strokes, they had great heavy swords which they fought with all neere hand. But at that time they did not marche directly in rancke against the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMAINES between them and their footemen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines founde their policy straight, but they coulde not keepe their fouldiers backe: for there was one that cried the enemies fled, and immediatly all the rest beganne to runne after. In the meane time, the footemen of the barbarous people that were like to a sea before them, came forwards still: &c then Marius having washed his handes, and lifting them up to heaven, promised, and vowed a folemne facrifice vnto the goddes of a hundred oxen. Catulus also made a vow, lifting vp his handes to heaven in like maner, that he would build a temple vnto fortune for that day; and it is reported, that Marius having facrificed, when they shewed him the intralls of the bealts facrificed: he cried out a low de, the victory is mine. But when they came to geue the charge Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred apon him by goddes inflice, who turned his craft against him selfe, as Sylla wryteth: for there rose very credibly so great a dust, that both armies lost the fight one of an other. And hereupon Marius being the first that rannew

The fielde fought the 27.0f Iuly.

The funne ful and the funne which was full in the CIMBRES faces, did the ROMAINES maruelous pleasure in the Climbres at that time. For the barbarous people being very hard brought vp to away with cold (bicause they were borne and bred in a cold contry, shadowed altogether with wooddes and trees as we have fayd) were to the contrary very tender against the heate, and did melt with sweatingsgainst the sunne, and gaped straight for breathe, putting their targets before their faces: forit was also in the hart of sommer, about the seuen and twentie day of the moneth of Julie, that this battell was geuen, and this dust also made the Romaines the bolder, and kept them that they could not see the innumerable multitude of their enemies farre from them. And energy man runninge to fet apon them that came against them, they were joyned together in fight, before that the fight of their enemies could make them afrayed. And furthermore, they were fo good fouldiers, and so able to take paines, that how extreame soeuer the heate was, no man was fene fweate nor blow, though they ranne at the first to set apon them: & this hath Catalan Luctative him selfe left in wryting vnto the praise of his souldiers. So were the most parte of the barbarous people, and specially of the best fouldiers, slaine in the field. And bicause the should not open nor breake their rancks, the foremest rancks were all tyed & bound together with girdells, leather thongs, & long chaynes of iron : and they that fled, were chased & following wed into their campe by the ROMAINES, where they met with horrible and fearefull things to beholde. For, their wives being apon the toppe of their cartes, apparelled all in blacke, flue all those that fled, without regarde of persones: some their fathers, other their husbandes or their brethren, and strangling the litle young babes with their owne handes, they cast them ter might be tryed frendly betwene them they made the Ambassadors of Parma their arbitrators, who were by chaunce at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius fouldiers led the Amhassadors to the place where the ouerthrowe was genen, thewing them the enemies bodies pearled through with their pykes, which were easie to be knowen, bicause Carulus had made them graue his name apon their pykes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this * great victory, as well for the first battell he wanne alone, when he ouerthrewe the TEVTONS and the Ambrons: as for his great calling, having bene Conful five times. And furthermore, Miehi outthe common people at Rome, called him the third founder of the city of Rome, thinking them counts right c selues now deliuered from as great a dauger, as before time they had bene from the auncient GAVLES. And every man featting at home with his wife and children, offered the best dishes of meate they had to supper, vnto the goddes, and vnto Marius: and would needes have him alone to triumphe for both victories. But he would not in any case, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to thew himselfe curreous and moderate in fo great prosperity: and peraduenture also fearing Catulus souldiers, who were in readinesse and prepared (if Marius would have deprived their Captaine of that honor) to let him also of his triumphe. And thus you fee howe he passed his fift Consulshippe, After that, he made more earnest sute for the fixt Conful hippe, then euer any other did for his first: feeking the peoples goodwilles by all the fayer meanes he could to please them, humbling him selse vnto them, not only more D then became his estate and calling, but directly also against his owne nature, counterfeating a curteous populer manner, being cleane contrarie to his disposition. His ambition made him timerous to deale in matters of the state concerning the city. For that corage and boldenesse which he had in battell against the enemy, he lost it quite when he was in an affembly of people in the city: and was eafily put out of his byase, with the first blame or praise he heard geuen him. And though they reporte, that on a time when he made a thowfande CAMERINES free of the city of Rome, bicause they had done valliant service in the warres, that there were fome that did accuse him, saying, that it was a thing done against all law: he aunswered them, that for the noyse of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithstanding, it seemeth that in dede he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an affembly of the city. For in time E of warres, he euer stoode apon his reputacion and authority, knowing that they had neede of him : but in peace and civill government, bicause he would rather be the chiefest man then the honestest man, he would creepe into the peoples bosomes to get their fauor and goodwil.

And thus through his euill behauior, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies.

But he feared nor mistrusted none so much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankefull parte he remembred he had played him: and the rather also, bicause heknew him to be a just & true most desperate, and most hardbraind young men, that were in all Rome: who had all the ra-blement of rogues and beggers, and fuch tumultuous people at their commaundement, by whose meanes he made new populer lawes, and caused the souldiers to be called home out of

that dragging them all about, and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. Now, though nubers were flaine by this meanes, yet were there three fcore thow fand of them Priferer 60. raken prisoners, and the number of them that were flaine, came to twife as many moe. vexe Metellus, Moreouer Rutilius, an honest and true writer, (howbeit an enemy vnto Marin) wryteth, that he obtained his fixt Confulthippe by corruption of money, which he caused in be distributed amongest the tribes of the people: & that he bought it for ready money to bin by Metellus, and to have Valerius Flaceus not for his fellowe and companion in the Confid thippe, but rather for a minister of his will. There was never ROMAINE to whome the people graunted the Consulfhippe fix times, except it were vnto Valerius Coruinus only. But for him they fay that there was five and forty yeares between his first Consulthip and the last. Where Marius fince the first yeare of his Consulthippe, continued fine yeares together by good for simes Confull. tune one after an other. But in his last Consulthip, he wanne him selfe great hate and make bicause he did many fowle faultes to please Saturninus withall : as amongest others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneship. Afterwardes & when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the people, he preferred alaw for distribution of the landes among the common people, and vnto that law he had specially added one article:that all the Lords of the Senate should come openly to sweare, that they should kepe and obsense from pointe to pointe that which the people by their voyces should decree, and should not deny it in any lotte. But Marius in open Senate, made as though he would withstand this article faving that neither he nor any other wife man of judgement would take this othe; for faid he, if the law be cuill, then they should doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to graunt it, and not of their owne goodwills. But he spake not that, meaning to do as he said for it was but a bayte he had layed for Metellus only, which he could hardly escape. For imagining that to tell a fine lye, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly refole ued with him felfe, not to paffe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the contrary also, knowinge well enough that Metellus was a graue wise man, who esteemed that to be iust and true (as Pindarus sayd) is the beginning and foundacion of great vertue: he thoughthe would outreach him, makinge him affirme before the Senate that he would not sweare, knowinge also that the people would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwardes to sweare, And so in dede it happened. For Metellus having assured them then that he would not sweare, the Senate brake vp vpponit. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senator vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to sweare before the people: Marius went this ther to offer him selfe to sweare. Whereupon the people making silence, listned attentively to heare what he would fay. But Marine not regarding his large promise & bragges made be 1 fore the Senate, fayed then, his necke was not follong, that he would prejudice the common wealth in a matter of fo great importance: but that he would fweare, and obey the lawe, ifit were a law. This shifting subtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his shame: and whenhe had fayd fo, he tooke his othe. The people feeing him fweare, were maruelous glad, and praifed him with clapping of their hands: but the nobility hanging downe their heads were aftamed of him, and were maruelous angry in their hartes with him, that he had so cowardly and shamefully gone from his word. The rupon all the Senate tooke their other, one after an other against their wills, bicause they were arrayed of the people. Sauing Metellus, whome, neither parentes nor frendes perswasion and intreaty could once moue to sweare, for any punishment that Saturninus had imposed upon them, which refused to take the othe, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would never yelde vnto it, offering to abide any payne, rather then to be brought to consent to a dishonest matter vnbeseming his estate. And there uppon went out of the affembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do cuill, it was too easie a thing: and to doe good without daunger, it was also a common matter: but to do well with daunger, that was the parte of an honest and vertuous man. Saturninus then commaunded the Confulls by edict of the people, that they should banshe Metellus by founde of trompet, with speciall commaundement, that no man should let him have fire nor water, nor lodge him privately nor openly. The common people, they were read dy to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the iniury they had offred him, gathered together about him to faue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus him felfe was fo good a man, that he would not any civill diffention should rise for his sake : and therefore he absented him selfe from Rome, wherein he did like a wife

man. For fayd he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting them felues of the wrong they have done me, will call me home againe: or elfe thinges flanding as they do now, ithalbe best for me to be furthest of. But for his trauaill in his exile, howe much he was beloued and honored, and how sweetely he passed his time studying philosophie in the citie of RHODES, shalbe declared more at large in his life. Now on the other side, Marius to recompece the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driven to let him have his will in all things: didnot foresee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the common wealth, geuing the brydle to a desperate man, who every way, by force, by sword and murder, plainly sought to vutpetyrannicall power, with the vtter destruction and subuertion of the whole common weale. And so bearing reuerence of the one side vnto the nobility, and desiring on the other Sideto gratifie the common people: he played a shamefull parte, and shewed him selfe a dou- Marins debte ble dealing man. For one night the nobilitie and chiefest citizens comming to his house, to dealing beperswade him to brydle Saturninus infolencie and boldnes: at the selfefame time also Saturni- billine and mer going thither to speake with him, he caused him to be let in at a backe dore, the noble men people. not being privy to his comming. And so Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus, that careth leditihe was troubled with a losenes of his body, under this pretence whipped up and downe, now on as Rome. notheone, then to the other, and did nothing else but set them further out one against an other, the they were before. Neuertheles, the Senate being maruelous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knightes taking parte with the Senate, Marius in the ende was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to suppresse them that were vp, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to velde them selves at the length, bicause he had cut of the pypes and conduits by the which the water ran vnto the Capitoll. By reason whereof, they being ynable to continue any lenger, called Marius voto them, and yeelded them selues to him, vinder the assurance of the saith of the common people. But although Marine did what he could possible to his vetermost power to faue them, No must so the he could not prevaile, nor doe them pleasure: for they were no sooner come downe into the faith of the market place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he having now purchased him selse theill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Cenfors shoulde bechosen euery man looked that he would have bene one of the suters: how beit he sued not for it, for feare of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of farre lesse dignity and calling then Dhim selfe. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, saying that he would not sue to be Censor, bicause he would not have the ill will of many, for examining too straightly their lines & manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible by word and deede to hinder it howbeit, seeing in the end he could not have his will, he let it alone. The people having thus willingly revoked Metellus banishment. Marius hart would not serue him to see Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him:wher- Metellus refore, he tooke the seas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, under colour to pay certaine banilbement, facrifices to the mother of the goddes, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the Mailuioney very cause that made him to vindertake this iorney, for he had an other secret meaning in it. into Cappado For his nature not being framed to live in peace, and to governe civil matters, and having attained to his greatnes by armes, and supposing that his glorie & authority consumed and decreased altogether living idlely in peace: he sought to devise new occasion of warres, hoping if he could firre vp the kinges of As I A, and specially Mithridates (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make wartes again the Roma is us) that he should then undoutedly without let of any man be chosen Generall to make warres with him, and withall alfo, that by that meanes he should have occasion to fill the citie of Roms with newe triumphes, and his house with the spoyles of the great kingdome of Ponta, and with the riches of the king. Now Methridates disposing him selfe to entertaine Marins, with all the honor and curtefies he could possibly shew him: Marius in the ende notwithstanding would not once gene him a good looke, nor a curreous word againe, but churlishly sayd vnto Mithridates at his departure from him, Thou must determine one of these two, king Mitbridates: ci. Marine ther to make thy selfe stronger then the ROMATNES, or else to looke to doe what they com- providendes

fore that the ROMAINES would freake their mindes freely: howbeit he neuer faw nor properly it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto Rome, he built a house necresion the market place, bicause he would not (as he said himself) that such as came vnto him should trouble them selves in going farreto bring him hometo his house:or else for that he thouse this would be an occasion that diverse would come to salute him, as they did other Senator Howbeit that was not the cause in deede, but the onely cause was, for that he had no named grace nor civility to entertaine men curteoully that came vnto him, and that he lacked behauior besides to rule in a common wealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him, then they did of an old rufty harnesse or implement that was good for no thing, but for the warres only. And for all other that professed armes as him selfe did, no man grieued him so much to be called forward to office and state before him selfe, as Sylla did. For 1 he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the noble men did all what they could to prefere Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes first risinge and preferrement grew, by the quarrells and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchu kine of NVMID IA Was proclaimed by the Senate, a frende and confederate of the ROMAINE PROPE he offred vp statues of victories, carying tokens of triumphe, into the temple of the Capital and placed neere vnto them also, an image of gold of king Ingurthe, which he deliuered by owne handes vnto Sylla. And this made Marins starke madde for spite and ielousie, and could mined to plucke those images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the otherside stomaked Marius, and would not suffer him to take them out of the place where they werely that this civill sedition had taken present effect, had not the warres of their confederates faldid Marius shame and dishonor. For he shewed him selfe very colde and slow in all his enterprifes, still delayinge time, either bicause age had mortified his active heate, and killed that the differentian not abide that an other should take upon him the glory of his doinges: insomuch as he deter-len out betwene, and restrained them for a time. For the best souldiers and most warlike perple of all ITALIE, and of greatest power, they all together rose against the ROMAINES, and The ware of had well neere ouerthrowen their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force and power, and well armed: but their Captaines also, for valliantnes and skill, did in maner equal the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this warre fell out wonderfully, by reason of the calami

quicke ready disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue three score and fine yeare olde: or else as he sayd him selse, bicause he was waxen gowry, and had acheinis vaines & finewes, that he could not well ftirre his body, and that for shame, bicause he would not tary behinde in this warre, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithfanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were flaine fix thowfande of their enemies: and fo long as the warres endured, he never gaue them advantage of him, but pacently suffred them sometime to intrenche him, and to mocke him, and geue him vilewords, chalenging him out to fight, & yet all this would not prouoke him. It is fayd alfo, that Pampe. dius Silo, who was the chiefest Captaine of reputacion & authority the enemies had said vino Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, fo great a Captaine as they fay thou art, leave thy campe, & come out to battel. Nay, said Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, pluckeme out by the eares, & copell me to come to battell. An other time when the enemies gauethen occasion to geue a great charge vpon them with advantage: the Romaine swere fainte harted, and durft not set upon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were revied, Marius caused his men to assemble, and spake vnto them in this sorte. I can not reli whicher the two I should recken most cowardes: you your selues, or your enemies: for they dust not once fee your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was compelled to refigne his charge, being able to ferue no lenger for the weakeneffe and debilitie of his body. Now, all the rebels of ITALIE being put downe, many at Rome (by the orators means) didfue to have the charge of the warres against Mithridates : and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitims, (a very bold and rash man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marins, and perswaded them to gene him the charge of these warres, with title and at thority of vice Confull. The people thereupon were deuided in two partes: for the one fide

A floode for Marius, and thother would have Sylla take the charge, faying, that Marius was to thinke nowe vppon the hotte bathes at Baies, to looke to cure his olde bodie, brought lowe with rewme and age, as him selfe sayd. For Marius had a goodly stately house in those partes neerevnto the mount of Misene, which was farre more fine and curiously furnished, then be- Mont Misene came a Captaine that had bene in fo many foughten battells and daungers. They fay that Cornelia afterwardes bought that fine house for the summe of seuen thowsande fine hundred crownes, and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thowsand crownes: to fo great excesse was vanitie and curiositie growen in very shorte time at Rome. Notwithstanding all this, Marius too ambitiously striuing like a passioned young man against Marius anthe weakenes and debility of his age, neuer miffed day but he would be in the field of Mars to bition. B exercise him selfe among the young men, shewing his body disposed and ready to handle all kinde of weapons, and to ryde horses: albeit that in his latter time, he had no great health of hody, bicause he was very heavy and sad. There were that liked that passing well in him, and went of purpose into the fielde to see the paines he tooke, striuing to excell the rest. Howbeit those of the better forte were very fory to see his anarice and ambition, considering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane persone a great estate; that he coulde not now containe his prosperity within reasonable boundes, nor content him selfe to be effeemed and honored, quietlie enjoyinge all he had wonne, and which at that prefenthe did possesse: but as if he had bene very poore and needy, after he had received such great honor and triumphes, would yet cary out his age fo flowtly, even into CAPPADOCIA. and ynto the realme of PONT, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neoptolemus Lieurenaunts of king Mithridates. In deede he alleaged some reasons to excuse him selfe. but they were altogether vaine: for he fayd that he defired in persone to bring up his sonne in exercise ofarmes, and to teach him the discipline of warres. That discouered the secret hidden plague.

which of long time hath lurked in Rome, Marius specially having now met with a fit instrument, and minister to destroy the common wealth, which was, the infolent and rash Sulpitius:

who altogether followed Saturninus doinges, lauing that he was found too cowardly & fainte harted in all his enterprises, and for that did Marius justly reproue him. But Sulvitius, bicause he would not dally nor delay time, had euer fixe hundred younge gentlemen of the order of knightes, whome he vied as his gard about him, and called them the gard against the Senate. subjiting god D And one day as the Confulls kept their common affembly in the market place, Sulpitius com- of fixe bunming in armed apon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing; and as Substitute they fled, one of the Confulls fonnes being taken tardy, was flaine, Sylla being thother Con- boldnes. full, and perceiving that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius house, ranne into the fame against the opinion of all the world: wherof they that ranne after him not being aware, passed by the house. And it is reported that Marius him selfe conveyed Sylla safelie out at a fellein his commentaries doth not say, that he was faued in Marius house when he fied : but thathe was brought thither to geue his consent vinto a matter which Sulpitino woulde have forced him vnto against his will, presenting him naked swordes on enery side. And he wryteth also, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius house, he was kept there in this feare, vntill fuch time as returninge into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiomement of iustice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done. Substitus then being the stronger, caused the commission & charge of this warres against Mithridates to be affigued vnto Marius by the voyce of the people. Therfore Marius geuing order for his departure, fent two of his Colonells before to take the army of Sylla: who having

wonne his fouldiers harts before, and stirred them vp against Marins, brought them on with him directly towardes ROME, being no leffe then fine and thirty thowfand fighting men iwho fetting apon the Captaines Marius had fent vnto them, flewe them in the fielder In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in Rome put many of Syllaes frendes and followers to death, and pro-F claimed open liberty by found of trompet, to all flaues and bondmen that would take atmes Marine fedifor him; but there were never but three only that offered them felues. 472 Marine flith runne his way. Marine was no fooner out of the citie, but they that were in his company for faking him, dispersed them selves here and there being darke night: and Marius him selsegor to a house of his in the contrie, called Salonium, and sent his sonne to one of his fatherin law Mutius farmes not farre from thence, to make fome prouision for vittells. But Marinis the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his frendes Numerius had prepared him a shippe, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarying for his sonne, and hoised fale having only Granius his wives some with him. In the meane time the younger Marius beinge at his father in law Mutius farme, stayed so long in getting of prouision, in trussing of it vp, and carying it away, that broade day light had like to have discovered him: for the enemies had aduertisement whether he was gone, whereupon certaine horsemen were sent thither suppofing to have found him. But the keeper of the house having an inckling of their comminge, a and preuenting them also before they came, sodainely yoked his oxen to the carte which loded with beanes, and hidde this younger Marius vinder the fame. And prickinge the oxen forward with his goade, fet out, and met them as he went towards the city, and deliuered Me. riss in this forte into his wines house : and there taking such thinges as he needed, whenthe night following came, went towards the fea, & tooke thippe, finding one croffe fayled, bound towards Africke. Marius the father faylinge on still, had a very good winde to poyntea. longest the coast of IT ALIB: notwithstanding, being afrayed of one Geminius, a chiefe manof TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the maryners warning thereof betimes and willed them to take heede of landing at TERRACINE. The maryners were very willing to obey him, but the winde stoode full against them comming from the mayne, which raised as great storme, and they feared much that their vessell which was but a bote, would not brook the feas, befides that he him felfe was very ficke in his ftomake, and fore fea beaten: notwithstanding, at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recoursed the coastouer against the city of CIRCHES. In the meane time, the storme increased still, and their vis tells failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp & down not knowinge what to doe, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in fuch like cases of extremitie, they thought it alwayes the best safetie for them, to slie from the plate where they were, and to hope of that which they faw not : for if the fea were their enemy, the lande was so likewise. To meete with men, they were afrayed : and not to meete with themon thother side lacking vtittells, was in deede the greater daunger. Neuerthelesse, in the endther met with heard men that could geue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warnedhim to get him out of the way as foone as he could possible, bicause it was not longe since that there passed by a great troupe of horseme that sought him all about. And thus being brought vnto fuch perplexity, that he knew not where to bestowe him selfe, and specially for that the poore men he had in his company were almost started for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and sought out a very thicke wodde where he passed all that night in great forow, and the next morninge beinge compelled by necessity, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandered on alongest the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, & praying them not to dispayre, but to retent them selues to him, even vntil the last hope, trusting in certaine prophecies which the Sooth-I Marisus found fayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwellingin the contry, he gathered up in the lappe of his gowne, the ayrie of an Éagle, in the which were feuen young Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothfayer what that ment. They answered, that their sonne one day should be one of the greatest menin the world, and that out of doubt he should obtaine seuen times in his life the chiefest officest dignity in his contry. And for that matter, it is fayd that so in dede it came to passe. Other hold opinion, that fuch as were about Marius at that time, in that present place, and else where, during the time of his flying they hearing him tell this tale, beleued it, and afterwardes put it downe in wrytinge, as a true thinge, although of trothe it is bothe false and fayned. For they say, that the Eagle neuer getteth but two younge ones : by reason whereof it is mayntayned also, that the Poet Museus hathe lyed, in that which he hathe wrytten in thek

Howfoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying fayd, that he was affured he should come vnto the seuenth Consulthip. When they were comen necre now to the city of M INT V RNES, about a two myle & a halfe fro it, they might perceive arroupe of horsemen comming by the sea side, and two shippes on the sea that sell vppon the coast by good happe. Wherefore they all beganne to runne (so long as they had breath and frength) towardes the fea, into the which they threw them felues, and got by fwymming vnto one of the shippes where Granius was : and they crossed ouer vnto the Ile that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heavy and sicke of body, two of his fer-B nauntes holpe to holde him vp alwayes about water, with the greatest paine and difficultie in the worlde: and at the last they labored so throughly, that they put him into the other shippe arthe selfe same present, when the horsemen came vnto the sea side, who cried out alowde to the maryners, to lande againe, or else throw Marius ouer borde, and then to goe where they would, Marius on thother fide humbly befought them with teares, not fo to do: whereby the masters of the shippe in ashorte space were in many mindes whether to doe it, or not to doe ir. In the ende notwithstanding, they aunswered the horsemen they would not throwe him ouer the borde: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But as soone as they were gone, themasters of the shippe chaunging minde, drewetowardes lande, and cast ancker about the mouth of the river of Livis, where it leaveth her banckes, and maketh great marysses: & there Livis f. C they tolde Marius he should doe well to goe a land to eate somewhat, and refresh his sea sicke body, till the winde ferued them to make faile, which doubtleffe fayed they, will be at a cerraine hower when the fea winde falles and becomes calme, and that there rifeth a litle winde from the lande, ingendred by the vapours of the maryfles, which will ferue the turne very well to take feas againe. Marius following their counfell, and thinking they had ment good faith, Marius fee a was set a lande vppon the rivers bancke: and there layed him downe apon the graffe, nothing land, and for suspecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners presently taking their shippe faken of mariners. againe, and hoyfing up their anckers, failed straight away, and fled: judging it no honesty for them to have delivered Marius into the handes of his enemies, nor safetie for them selves to haue faued him, Marius finding him felfe all alone, & for faken of euery man, lay on the ground Dagreat while, and fayd neuer a word: yet at the length taking harte a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandred vp and downe, where was neither way nor pathe at all ouerthwart deepe marisses and great ditches, full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore olde mans cotage, dwelling there in these marisses, and fallingeathis seete, belought him to helpe to faue and fuccour a poore afflicted man, with promife that one day he would geue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present daunger wherein he was. The olde man whether for that he had knowen Marius aforetime, orthat seeing him (by coniecture only) judged him to be some great personage: told him that ifhement but to lye downe and rest him selfe a litle, his poore cabyne would serue that turne reasonably well: but if he ment to wander thus, to flic his enemies that followed him, he would E then bring him into a more fecret place, and farder of from noyle. Marius prayed him that he would so much doe for him: and the good man brought him into the marishe, vnto a low Maniu bidplaceby the rivers fide, where he made him lye downe, and then covered him with a great den in the deale of reede and bent, and other fuch light thinges as could not hurte him. He had not long bene there, but he heard a great noyfe comming towardes the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of TERRACINE had fent men all about to feeke for him, whereof fome by chaunce came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatned him that he had recemed and hidden an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing that, role out of the place where the old man had layed him, and stripping him selfe starke naked, went into a parte of the marishe where the water was full of myre and mudde, and there was founde of those that fearched for Marini soft. F him: who takinge him out of the flime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of MIN-TVRNES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours handes. uered him into the fafe custody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to hauchen a bitter enemie of his, for an old grudge the had to him, which was this: Fannia formtime had a husband called Tinnius, whom the was willing to leave for that they could not agre, and no quired her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husbande againe fayed, shehad played the whore. The matter was brought before Marine in his fixt Conful hippe, who had geuen judgement apon it. Both parties being heard, and the law profecuted on either fide it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it well enough before he maried her, yet tooke her with her faultes, and long time lived with her. Wherefore Marius being angrie with them both, gaue sentence that the husband should repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, the should pay foure farthings. This por. withstanding, when Fannia saw Marius, the grudged him not for that, and least of all had any reuenginge minde in her towardes him, but contrarily did comforte and helpe him what the could with that the had, Marius thanked her maruelously for it, and bad her hope well; bicant he met with good lucke as he was comming to her house, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neere to Fanniaes house, her dore being open, there came an affe running out to go drinke at a conduit: not farre from thence: and meeting Marius bythe way, looked apon him with a lively joyfull countenaunce, first of all stopping sodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out alowde, and to leape and skippe by him. Whereuppon Marius straight coniecturing with him felfe, faid, that the goddes did fignifie vnto him, that her should faue him selfe sooner by water then by lande: bicause that the asse leaving him, range to drinke, and cared not to eate. So when he had tolde Fannia this tale, he defired to reft, and prayed them to let him alone, and to shut the chamber dore to him. But the magistrates of the citie having consulted together about him, in the ende resolued they must deferre no lenge time, but dispatche him out of the way presently. Now when they were agreed apon it, they one hiered to could not finde a man in the citie that durft take apon him to kill him: but a man of armer of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we finde both the one and the other in wayting) that went thither with his fword drawen in his hande. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he sawe two burninge flames come out of Marius eyen, and heard a voyce out of that darke come. faying vnto him : O fellowe, thou, darest thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing these wordes, ranne out of the chamber presently, casting his sworde in the middest of the flower, and crying out these wordes onely: I can not kill Caim Marius, This made the MINTY RNIANS afraied in the city at the first, but afterwards it moved them to compassion. So they were angry with them selues, and did repent them that they converted their counfell to fo cruell and vinkinde a deede, against one that had preserved all I TALIE: andw deny him aide in so extreame necessity, it was too great a sinne. Therefore let vs let him goe, fayed they to them selues, where he will, and suffer him take his fortune appointed him else where; and let vs pray to the goddes to pardone this offence of ours, to have thrust Marin naked and beggerly out of our city. For these considerations, the MINTVRNIANS went all to gether to Marina where he was, and stoode about him, determining to see him safely conducted vnto the fea fide. Now though every man was ready, and willing to pleafure him, fome with one thing, some with an other, and that they did hasten him all they could possible, yet they were a good while a going thither: bicause there was a wodde called Marica, that laye right in their way betwene their city and the fea coast which they greatly reuerence, & thinks it a feriledge to cary any thing out of that wodde, that was once brought into it. On thother fide, to leaue to goe through this wodde, and to compaffe it rounde about, it would asked maruelous long time. So they ftanding all in doubt what they should doe, one of the auncientest men of the city, spake alowde vnto them, and said: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to faue Marius life. Then Marius him felfe being the formest man, taking s up fome of the fardells which they caried with him, to pleasure him in the ship, went through the wodde. All other things necessary being thus readily prepared for him with like goodwil

A and specially the shippe which one Bellaus had ordained for him : he caused all this storie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke shippe. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune carried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he founde Granius and some other of his frendes, with whom hetooke sea againe, and pointed towardes AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compel- Maiss the led to lande in Sicilia, in the territory of the city of Erix: where by chaunce there laye a into Africke. ROMAINE Quæstor, who kept that coast. Marine being landed there, scaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he flue fixteene of his men that came out with him to take water, So Marius getting him thence with all speede, crossed the seas, vntill he arrived in the lle of MENYNGE, where he first understoode that his some was faued with Cetherus, and that B they were both together gone to Hiempfal king of the NVMIDIANS to befeeche him of avde.

This gave him a little corage, & made him bold to passe out of that Ile, into the coast of CAR-THAGE. Nowe at that time, Sextilius a Romain & Prætor was gouernor of A FRICKE. Vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, & therfore he hoped, that for pity only he might perhappes haue helpe at his hande. Howbeit he was no fooner landed with a few of his men, but a fergeaunt came straight and sayd vnto him: Sextilius, Prator and gouernor of Libya, doth forbid thee to lande in all this province: otherwise he telleth thee, that he will obay the Senates commaundement, and pursue thee as an enemy of the ROMAINES. Marine hearing this commaundement, was so angry and sory both, that he coulde not readily tell what aunfwere to make him, and pawfed a good while and fayd neuer a word, still eying the fergeaunt C with a grimme looke: vntill he asked him, what auniwer he would make to the Prætors commaundement. Marius then fetching a deepe figh from his harte, gaue him this aunswer. Thou that tell Sextilius, that thou hast feene Cains Marius banished out of his contrie, fittinge a- Marius mife mongest the ruines of the city of CARTHAGE. By this aunswere, he wisely layed the example answere of of the ruine and destruction of that great city of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the confiancy. chaunge of his fortune: to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vppon him. In the meane time, Hiempfal king of the NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to refolue, did honorably intreate young Marius and his companie. But when they were willing to goe their way, he alwayes foundenewe occasion to stay them, and was very glad to see that he started not for any oportunity or good occasion that was offered: notwithstandinge, there fortuned a happy meane

afayer complexioned young man, it pitied one of the kinges concubines to fee him to hardly deli withall. This pity of hers was a shadow to cloke the loue she bare him : but Marses would nothearken at the first to her intifementes, and refused her. Yet in the ende, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and confidering that she did all thinges for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then the would have done, if the had not ment further matter vnto him, then only to enjoy the pleasure of him: he then accepted her loue and kyndnesse, so as at the length she taught him a way howe to siye, and saue him selfe and his Marius the frendes. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had imbraced and faluted eche other, younger effectivengoing alongest the sea side, they founde two scorpions fightinge together. Marini tooke this plate hands. E for an ill figne: wher upon they quickly tooke a fifther boate, and wet into the ile of Chat Than,

which is no great distaunce of from firme lande. They had no soner hoised up ancher; but they fawe the horse men which kinge Hiempfal had sent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greatest daungers that Marins euer escaped. In the meane time there was newes at Rome, that Silla made warre against kinge Mithridises Lifetitenauntes: and furthermore, that the Confulls being up in armes thone against thother, Otta- cinna trium wins wanne the battell, and being the stronger had driven out Cinna, who sought to have vier- out of Rome pedryrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Confull in his place: and that Cinna by Offanius. on thother fide leavied men out of other partes of ITALIE, and made warres upon them that were in Rome. Marius hearing of this diffention, thought good to returne as foone as he would come to him. So the laborers, heard men, and neateheardes of all that marche, forthe onely name and reputacion of Marius, ranne to the sea side from all partes: of the whichhe having chosen out the stowtest and lustiest of them, wanne them so by fayer wordes, that he uing gathered a great companie together in few dayes, he made fortie fayle of them. Further, more, knowing that Octavius was a maruelous honest man, that would have no authorities therwise then law & reason would: and that Cinna to the contrarie was suspected of Sylla, and that he fought to bring in chaunge and innouation to the common wealth, he determined in ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius fent first vnto Cinna, to lette him vnderstande that he would obay him as Confull, and be ready to do all that he should commaunde him. Cinnate. ceiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconfull, and fent him fergeauntsma carie axes and roddes before him, with all other fignes of publicke authoritie. But Marinere. fused them, and sayed, that pompe became not his miserable fortune: for he euer wenting poore threede bare gowne, and had let his heare grow still after he was banished, being abone three score and tenne yeare olde, and had a sober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that fawe him. But vnder all this counterfeate pitie of his, he neuer chaunged his namrall looke, which was ever more fearefull and terrible, then otherwise. And where he finder but litle, & went very demurely & foberly: that shewed rather a cankered corage within him. then a minde humbled by his banishment. Thus when he had saluted Cinna, and spoken to the fouldiers: he then beganne to fet thinges abroache, and made a wonderfull chaunge in fewe dayes. For first of all, with his shippes he cut of all the vittells by sea, & robbed the marchains that caried corne and other vittells to Rome: fo that in a shorte space he was master purueyer for all necessarie prouision and vittells. After this he went alongest the coast, and tooke all the cities apon the sea side, and at the length wanne O STIA also by treason, put the most parte of them in the towne to the fword, and spoyled all their goodes: and afterwards making a bridge apon the river of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to have any manner of provision by fea. That done, he went directly towardes Rome with his armie, where first he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octavius faulte: who overthrewe him felfe in his doinges, noth Offanine nemuch for lacke of reasonable skill of warres, as through his ynprofitable curiositie and strictnes in obseruing the law. For when diverse did perswade him to set the bond men at libertym take armes for defence of the common wealth: he aunswered, that he would neuer gene bond] men the law and priviledge of a ROMAINE citizen, having driven Caius Marius out of Rome, to maintaine the authoritie of the lawe. But when Cacilius Metellus was come to Rome, the fonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that having begonne the warres in Libya against king is gurthe, was put out by Marius: the fouldiers for fooke Octavius immediatly, and came vnto him, bicause they tooke him to be a better Captaine, and desired also to have a leader that could tell how to commaund them, to faue the citie, and the common wealth. For they promised to fight valliantly, & perswaded them selves that they should overcome their enemies, fo that they had a skilfull & valliant Captaine that could order them. Metellus misliking their offer commaunded them in anger to returne againevnto the Confull: but they for spicewent vnto their enemies. Metellus on thother fide, feeing no good order taken in the citie to refill the enemies, got him out of Rome. But Octavius being perswaded by certaine Soothsayers and CHALDEAN facrificers, who promifed him all should goe well with him, taried stilling ROME. For that man being otherwise, as wise as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that delt as vprightly in his Confulfhippe, not caried away with flattering tales, and one also that sol lowed the auncient orders and customes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any parte therof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequeted the Southfavers, wife men, and aftronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and government, Where fore, before that Marius him felfe came into the citie, Octavius was by force pluct out of the pulpit for orations, and flaine presently by Marius souldiers, whome he had sent before into the citie. And it is faved also, that when he was slaine, they founde a figure of a CHALDEAN F prophecie in his bosome: and here is to be noted a great contrarietie in these two notable men, Octavius and Marius. The first lost his life, by trusting to foothsaying: and the seconde

CAIVS MARIVS. A profeered, & role againe, bicause he did not despise the arte of dimination. The state of Roma franding then in this maner, the Senate confulting together, fent Ambassadors vnto Cinna and Marins, to pray them to come peacibly into Romes, and not to embrue their hands with the blood of their citizens. Cinna litting in his chayer as Conful, gaue them audience. & made them a very reasonable and curteous aunswer. Marine standing by him, spake neuer a worde: but shewed by his sower looke that he would straight fill Rome with murder and blood. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome environned with a great number of fouldiers: but Marius stayed sodainly at the gate, speaking partely in anger, and partely in cinne and mockerie, that he was a banished man, and driven out of his contrie by law. And therefore if Marine entry they would have him come into Rome againe, they should first by a contrarie decree abolish into Rome. and renoke that of his banishment, as if he had bene a religious observer of the lawes, and as though Rome had at that present enjoyed their freedom and libertie. Thus he made the people affemble in the market place to proceede to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to geue their voices, difguiling the matter no lenger, and showing plainly that he ment not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into ROMB with a garde about him, of the verieft rafcalls, & most shameleffe flaues, called the BARDIOEIANS, who came to him from all partes: and they for the least word he spake, or at Radiation the twinckling of his eye, or at a nodde of his head made to them flew many menthrough his Marine cancommaundement, and at the length flew Ancharius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Ma-fed greatmir. rius feete with their swordes, bicause only that Marius did not salute him when he came one day to speake with him. After this murther, they continued killinge all them that Marins did not falute, and speake vnto; for that was the very signe he had geuen them, to kill them openwin the streetes before every man, so that his very frendes were afearde of being murthered, when they came to falute him. Thus being a great number of men flaine, Cinna in the end beganneto be satisfied, and to appeale his anger. But Marius anger and vnsatiable defire of reuenge increased more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him neuer so litle: ornelise. and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skowtes & spies, to hunte them out that hidde them selues and sed. Then experience taught them, that no frende is faithfull, Small miss of and to be trusted, if fortune especially frowne neuer so line: for there were very sewe that did frinder in ad. not betray their frendes that fled to them for succor. And therefore doe Cornes servaints so wessite D much the more deserve praise, who having secretly hidden their master in his house, did hang new second vp the dead body of fome common persone by the necke, and having put a goldering on his sus fermanns finger, they shewed him to the BARDIOEIANS, Marius garde, and buried him in steade of to their matheir owne master, without suspicion of any man that it was a fained thing : and so Cornutus steel being hidden by his feruauntes, was fafely conveyed into the contrie of GAVLE. Marke An- M. Anionius thony the Orator had also founde out a faithfull frende, yet was he infortunate. This faithfull the Orator, frend of his, was a poore simple man, who having received one of the chiefest men of Rome berrayed by a into his house to kepe him close there: he being desirous to make him the best chere he could with that litle he had, fent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetche wine, and tailinge the wine more curiously then he was wont to do, he called for better. The drawer asked him, why E the new ordinary wine would not ferue him, but he must needes haue of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply aunswered him (telling him as his familiar frend) that his mafter did fealt Marke Anthony, who was hidden very fecretly in his house. He was no sooner gone with his wine, & his backeturned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was fet at Supper when he came. The drawer beinge brought to him, promised him to deliuer Marke Anthony into his handes, Marius hearing that, was fo ioconde, that he cried out, and claps his handes together for joyetand would have rifen from the borde, and gone thither him felfe in persone, had not his frendes kept him backe. But he sent Annius one of his Captaines thither with a certaine number of fouldiers, and commaunded them to bringe him his heade quickely. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the dore, and the fouldiers went up the stayers into the chamber, & finding Anthony there, they beganne to encorage one an other to kill him, not one of them having the harte to lay handes uppon him. For Anthonyes tongue was as

as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewardes, fella weeping. Annius perceiuing they taried long, and came not downe, went him felfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthony talking to his fouldiers, and them weeping, his fweete eld and with the smoke thereof choked him selfe. Now after their heades were cut of they threw a out the naked bodies into the streetes, and trodde them under their feete: the which was not only a pitiefull, but a fearefull fight to all that fawe them. But after all this yet, there was no.

thing that grieued the people fo much, as the horrible lechery & abhominable cruelty of this gard of the BARDIEIANS, who comming into mens houses by force, after they had slaine the thefe cuills and vnfpeakeable miferies to cease a litle, bicause the wicked doers of the same looked they should have warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereuppon Marius was chosen Consult the seuenth time. He going out of his house openly the first day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take possession of his Consulthippe: caused one Sextus Lucinus to be throwen downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian, which feemed to be a great figne and certaine token of the euills and miseries, that fell out afterwards the selfe same yere apon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie belide. But Marius being fore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppressed with extreame forow and griefe, could not now at this last time of neede plucke up his harte to him againe, when he came to thinke of this newe toward warre that threatned him, and of the daungers, griefes, and troubles he should h enter into, more great and perillous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he beganne to thinke of it, confidening that he had to fight, not with Octavius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a companie of rebells gathered together: but with anoble Sylla, that had driven him out of Rome before, and that came now from driving the puisant king Mithridates, vnto the furdest parte of the realmost PONT, and of the fea Euxinum. Thus, deepely waying and confidering the fame, and specially when he looked backe uppon his long time of banithment, how vacabondlike he wande red vp and downe in other contries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paffed, and the fundrie daungers he fell to often into, being pursued still by sea and by land : it grieuedhim

But at the length there came one from the sea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: & that was an increase of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extreamely troubled, partely for feare of the thing to come, &parte ly also for the ouer heavie burden of his present ill, there neded but litle more aggravation, to I fall into the disease whereof he dyed, which was a plewrifie : as Posidonius the Philosophu wryteth, who faveth plainly that he went into his chamber when he was ficke, and fpake vnto

A him about matters of his Ambassade, for the which he came to Rome. Yet an other historiographer Caius Pifo wryteth, that Marius walking one day after supper with his frendes, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him : concluding, that it is no wife mans parte to trust her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leave of them, and layed him downe you his bed, where Marine the helay ficke feuen dayes together, and on the feuenth day dyed. Some wryte that his ambition fathers death. appeared plainly, by a straungerauing that tooke him in his head during his sickenes. For he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, and shewed in his bed all his gestures and mouings of his bodie, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the felfe fame cryes out alowde, which he was wont to crie when he was in the extreament fight. The defire he had to have taken this charge in hande against Mithridates, was so deepely setled in his minde through extreame ambition. ambition and icalouzy that possess than that being then three score and ten yeare old, after he had bene the first man that euer was chosen seuen times Consullin Rome, and also after that he had gotten a world of goodes and richesse together that might have sufficed many kinges; the amb

First, for that he had made him areasonable man. as his death. and no brute beaft: fecondly, a Greke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported also, that one Antipater of THARS IS, calling to mind a lide before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forgette amonge other thinges, to tell of the happie nauigation he made, comming from his contrie vnto ATHENS:

which did witnesse that he put upon the fyle of his good accompts for a singular great grace, all fauor fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memorie, being the onely and most assured treasure a man can have, to kepe those giftes that nature or fortune doe beflowe ypon him. But contrariwife, vnthankefull fooles vnto God and nature both, doe forget with time the memory of their former benefittes, and laying vp nothing, nor keping it in per-

& leaving in the meane time the things present, though reason perswades them the contrary. For fortune may eafily let the of the thing to come, but she can not take that from the which is already past: and yet they veterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto the, & dreame alwayes of that which is vncertaine. And fure it chaunceth to them by great reason. For, having gathered outward goodes together, and locking them vp before they have built and layd a fure grounded foundation of reason through good learning: they can not afterwardes fill nor quenche their vnfatiable greedie couetous minde. Thus ended Marius his life, the feuenteenth day of his feuenth Confulfhippe, whereof all the citie of Rome was not a little glad, and tooke harte againe vnto them, supposing they had then bene deliuered from a bloodie cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their coft, that they had chaunged an olde mafter taken out of the worlde, for a younger that came but newly to them : fuch extreame vnnaturall cruelties, & murders did Marius the younger com-

At the first, they tooke him for a valliant and hardy young man, whereuppon they named him the sonne of Mars: but shortly after his deedes did shew the contrary, and then they called him the sonne of Venus. In the end he was shut in, and befieged by Sylla in the city of Pervs 1A, where he did whathe could possible to faue his life, but all was in vaine: & lastly, seeing

N the treasorie of the A CANTHIANS, which is in the temple of A pollo at DELPHES, there is this inscription: Brasidas, and the Acar-THIANS, with the spoile of the ATHENIANS. That inscription makets many men thinke, that the image of frone that standeth within the chamber by the dore therof, is the image of Brasidus: howbeit in truth at it is the liuelie image of Lyfander him felfe, made with a great buth of heare, & a thicke long beard after the old auncient facion. And when fome fay that the ARGIVES, after they were ouercome and had loft a great battell, did all of them shaue them selues in token and signed common forrow : and that the LACED & MONIANS on thother fide to shewe the ioy of their victory, did all let their heares growe, that is not true. And furthermore, it is fayd that Ariftoelitus, the father of Life der, was not of the royall blood of the kinges of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his sonne Lylander was very meanely and poorely brought up, being asobedient to the lawes and statutes of his contrie, as any other man was, showing him selfealwayes very strong and constant against all vanitie and pleasure, sauing only in matters of ho-C The education nor and curtesie, which they offer vnto those that deserue well. For they thinke it no shame nor dishonesty in Sparta, that the young men doe suffer them selves to be overcome with that delite and pleasure: but doe so bring up their children, that from their youth they would have them to have some tast and feeling of honor, deliting to be praised, and sorie to be difcomended. For they make no accompt of him that is not moved with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no manner of minde to doe good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and stowtnesse that was bred in Lylander, pro-

For bringing ftore of golde and filter into his contrie after he had ouercomen the ATHENIANS, he referred not vnto him selfe one Drachi ma only. And furthermore, when Dionysius the tyran of Synacus a hadron a time sent good

increase that he would make, and caused tenne thowsande Darickes to be delinered himsh meane whereof headded to the ordinary pay of the maryners, the increase of a halfe perma day. This liberality, within few dayes after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For the most parte of their maryners & galley men went where they might have the best payrant fuch as remained behinde, became very dull, lafie, and feditious, dayly troubling their Can taines and gouernors. Now though Lyfander had drawen his enemies men from them by the policie, and had done this great hurte, yet he durft not fight it out by fea, fearing the worth nes of Alcibiddes: who was a valliant man, and had greater store of shippes then he had, and besides that, was neuer ouercome by lande nor by sea, in any battell where he was General So it chauced, that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of Samos, vnto the city of PHOCEA, which standeth vpon firme lande directly ouer against Samos, and leaving the whole charge of his fleete in his absence, with Antiochus his pylot : he being more hardie then wise, in scorneam derision of Lylander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of Ephesys, and went by the arienall (where all their shippes lay in docke) with great noyle and laughing. This put Lylands in such a heate and chase, that first of all he put a fewe gallies to the sea, and had him in that with them. But afterwardes, perceiuing that the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after an other to the rescue, he armed other gallies also: so that supplying still with a few on either fide, at the length they came to a maine battell, which Lyfander wanne, & hauise taken fifteene of their gallies, he fet vp a token of triumphe and victory. When the peoples villarie of she Atheni-ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were fo angrie with Alcibiades, that the ans by sea. shifcharged him prefently of his charge : and the fouldiers also that lay in campe in the lies SAMOS, beganne to mislike him, and to speake ill of him. Whereuppon he presently lethis campe, and went into the contrie of CHERRONESUS in THRACIA. This battell was more

And thus by this meanes, euery man came to take his part, and they all fought and defired to gratifie and pleafe him: hoping, that what great matter for euer fell out, they assured theselues in maner that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to have the government in his owne hands. And therefore they nothing rejoyced at Calling 1 tidas comming, who came to fucceede him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and inst a man as coulde be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerninge which was plaine, and without any arte or cunning But they commended the perfectio of his vertue, as they would have done the image of some demy god made after the olde facion, which had bene of fingular beawty. But in the means time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender love and good will he bare to his frends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him . So when Lysander tookethe olde image of feas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as fory as could be pomon, again feas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as fory as could be pomon, again feas to return the rest of the money of the money of the money of the money. affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongest many other thinges, he sent the rest of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had geven him to pay the maryners : faving, that Callisratidas should go him selfe to aske it, if he would have it, and finde the meanes to entertaine their cities into their handes: promifing them, that fo foone as the ATHENIANS were out throwen, they them felues also should be deliuered from subjection of their people, and energy one of them should be are chiefe rule in their contry. And this he performed to them all, and made every one of them proue his wordes true. For he preferred all them that had benehis

olde frendes, vnto the best offices and charges: not sparing to doe against all right and reason,

A his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliver, leave, and affigne over the armie into his handes, commaunding all the sea. But Callieratidas, to ouercome his false ambicion, and fowle boasting lye aunswered him againe, and faied. If that be true thow faiest, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the city of MILETVM, as thou goest by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for fith thou commaundest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in Samos. Lylander thereto replied. that the armie was no more at his commaundement, and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto Pelopo NNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity. For he had brought no money out of his contrie with him neither would he compell the cities to furnishe him with any, seeinge that they were at that time too much B moubled already. Then had he no other way but to goe to the Lieutenauntes of the king of PERSIA, to aske them money as Lylander had done. But he was the vnmeetest man for it that

Burthe second time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and retorned backe (as he came) to the citie of E PHESV Scutfing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased them selves, as to goe sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be mowdeand stately for their goodes and riches : swearing before them all that were present, the GREE CTANSY & fet them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, & also that they should medle with them no more, nor needetheir aide to destroy one an other. But Gallieratidas having the noble harte of a Spartan, and being to other Captaine they could fende them. So much did Cyrus also wryte vnto them. But bicanse therewas an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twife Admirall, and besides, they being willing to graunt the request of their confederats, made one Aracus their Admirall, but ineffect gaue Lylander the whole authoritie of all thinges. Who was maruelous welcome vntogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and could be possible: for he was of a noble and berall nature, and thought it leffe dishonor & reproache vnto the Greecians, to be ouercome by other Greecians, then to goe flatter the Wolhing effeharbarons people, and seeke to them that had gold & silver enough, but otherwise, no good- med with the nes nor honesty. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his iorney Barbarians rowards Lynn, and went directly to Cyrus courte: where at his first comming he willed them tolet him vnderstand, that Gallicratidas the Admirall of the LACED & MONIANS would speake with him. One of the fouldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my frende, fyr straunger, Cyruis not at leafure nowe, for he is fet at dinner. Callicratidas aunswered him plainely againer callicratidas that afterwardes he might, put them all to death as he did. For they that trusting to his words remained quiet in the city were all put to death. Moreouer, Androclidas touching this matter hath left in wryting that which Lyfander was wont to fay: by the which it appeareth, thathe beganne to row with all their gallies fet in order of battell in a fronte. But Lylander, though he had his shippes in order to fight, the proes lying towardes the enemies before day, rowed not straightly that they should not stirre at all, but keepe them selues in order, making no novse, nor rowing against the enemy. Though the ATHENIANS also were retyred in the night he would not geue the fouldiers leave to come to lande out of the gallies, before he had fent first two or three gallies to discrie the fleete of his enemies; who brought him word that they had draw them selues vnto, considering that they had but a litle way to go, & also that they should haue the citie to backe them, which would furnish them with all thinges necessarie land befide that, they should be further of from their enemies, which were governed by one generall onely that did commaund them all, and were fo well trained, that at a whiftle they were ready straight to execute his commaundement. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captaines of the

AT HENTAN'S were not only milliked, but furthermore there was one called Trdew, that an-had the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quietly went his way.

The fift day, the ATHENIANS having made the fame countenaunce to prefent battell vnto

From thence he went & landed on the firme lande in the contrye of ATTICAL and did his dutie there vnto Agis king of LACED EMONIA, who came purposely from the foresis Decelea to the sea side to see him, bicause their armye by lande also shoulde see what power they had by sea, and howe it ruled more by sea then they woulde. Neuertheles, being aducttifed that the fleete of the ATHENIANS followed harde after him, he tooke an other course ! to flye backe againe into As I A by the Iles: and returninge againe, founde all the company HELLESPONT without men of warre. So he laied fiege before the citie of LAMPSACY'S, and did affault it with his gallies by fea: and Thorax being come thither also at the selfe fametime in great hast with his armie by land, gaue thas fault on his side. Thus was the citie takenby force, which Lylander left to the spoile of the souldiers. Now in the meane time the sleeted the ATHENIANS (which was a hundred and foure fcore faile) came to an ancker before the citie of ELEVNTE, in the contrie of CHERRONESVS: and newes being broughte them that the city of LAMPSACVS was taken, they came with all fpede possible vnto the citie of SESTON where getting freshe acates and vittelles, they coasted all alongest the coast vnto a certains place called the goates river, directly over against the fleete of their enemies, which layer

the play of kayles, and men with othes of men, following therein Polyerates, the tyran of S. Mos, but without reason: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent vsurper of m. rannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behaue him selfem. wardes the goddes none otherwise, then towardes men, but rather worse, & more injuriously For he that deceiveth his enemy, & breaketh his othe to him: sheweth plainly that he fearen r him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore having fent for Lylander to come to San DIS to him, gaue him money largely, and promifed him more: and bicause he would more honorably shewe the good will he had to gratifie him, tolde him, that if the kinge his father to fetche their vittells farre of, at the citie of Sestos, vnto which haven they should rather would geue him nothing yet he would geue him of his owne. And furthermore, whe all other meanes fayled to helpe him with money, that rather then he should lacke he would melt his owne chayer to make money of which he fate in when he gaue audience in matter of inflice being altogether of gold and filuer. And to be shorte, when he was going into MEDIA to the king his father, he gaue Lyfander power to receive the taxes and ordinary tributes of thece ties under his gouernment, and made him Lieutenaunt of all his contry. And laftly, bidding him farewell, praied him that he woulde not geue battell by fea vnto the ATHENTANS, vntil h D swered him very lewelly: that he had nothing to doe to commaunde the armie, but other that he returned from the courte: and that before his comming againe he woulde have authoritie to leaving a greate number of shippes, as well out of Phoeni CIA, as out of CILICIA. Wherefore whilest Cyrus was in his iorney, Lysander not being able to fight with his enemies with

A thumbes of their right handes that were taken in the warres, to thend they should no more handle the pyke, but only serue to pull the ower. Both the tone and the tother rested that day, hoping to have battel without faile the next morning. But Lyfander having an other meaning with him, commaunded the maisters and maryners notwithstanding, that they should have their gallies ready to geue battell the next morninge by breake of day, bicause euery man thould get a bord betimes, and thould keepe them felues in order of battell, making no noise order in maat all, attending what he would commaunde them: and further, made the armie by lande also vine fight. toberanged in battell ray, by the fea fide. The next morning at funne rifing the ATHENIANS

The next morning they did the like, the third days and the fourth also all in one forte: fo that the ATHENIANS beganne to be bold of them felues, and to definite their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for feare of them, and durit not come for ward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the contries of Gribanowas vol Alcibiades in certaine places which he had conquered) came ryding to the campe of the Ar Heln IANS, gave good ad-C totell the Captaines and generalls of the armie, the great faultes they committed. downe to fleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their Captains ignoraunce and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were ready to joyne and fall your them with great cries and noyle of owers, Conon having eight gallies, stale secretly out of the fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, faued him felfe in the Ile of CIPRVS. In the meane time, the

And as for the men, fomework flaine by their shippes as they ranne vnto them like naked men without weapon, and our of order, thinking to have faued them selves : other were killed in flying, bicause the enemies landed and had them in chase. And there were taken aliue of them, three thowsand prisoner with the Captaines. Lasander moreouer tooke all the whole fleete of their shippes, the hole galley excepted called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had defitioned all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he fastened the gallies that were taken, vnto the keele of his gallies, and returned with fonges of triumphe, with the found of flutes and hoboves, towark

And therefore fome thought, that this great ouerthrowe was genen by the gods and fayd: that at the departure of Lylanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to go fet aponthe fleete of the enemies, they perceaued ouer Lylanders galley the two fires, which they call the starres of Castor and Pollux: the one on the tone side of the galley, and the other of Cafter, and Pollux. on thother side. They say also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did signific this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the ayer a maruelous A flone fell out of the elegreat stone, in the place they call the goates river, which stone is seene yet vnto this day, hold den in great reuerence by the inhabitauntes of the citie of CHERRONES VS. It is fayd also that AEgos fl. Anaxagor as did prognosticate, that one of the bodies tyed vnto the vaulte of the heaten h should be pluckt away, and should fall to the ground by a slyding & shaking that should have pen. For he fayd, that the starres were not in their proper place where they were first created were kept by the great violece of the circuler motion of the element, euen as at the beginning of the world they had bene stayed & let from falling downe beneath, at that time when these paration was made of the colde and heavy bodies, from the other substaunce of the vnineral world. There is an other opinion of certaine Philosophers, where there is more likelyhoode then in that. For they fay, that those which we call falling starres, be no fluxions nor dering

cions of the fire elementorie, which are put out in the ayer, in a manner fo foone as they be E lighted: nor also an inflammation or cobustion of any parte of the ayer, which by her to ouermuch quantity doth foread vpwardes: but they are celestiall bodies, which by some flackens of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of heaven, are throwen and cast downches beneath, not alwayes in any parte of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroade in the great Occean fea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the space of three from and fifteene yeares together, before that this stone did fall, they saw a great lumpe of sier continually in the ayer like a clowde inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went and came with diuerle broken remouings, by the driving whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the starres do that fall. In the end, i when this great body of fire fell in that parte of the earth, the inhabitants of the contrie, after that they were a litle boldened from their feare and wonder, came to the place to fee whatit confidering that they were heavy bodies, and of the nature of stone : howebeit that they did

A was and they found no manner of fnew or apparaunce of fire, but only a very great flone ly ingrponthe ground, but nothing in comparison of the least parte of that which the compaffe of this bodie of fire did thew, if we may fo name it. Sure herein, Damachus wordes had neede offauorable hearers. But againe if they betrue, then he viterly confuteth their argumentes. out flory. Whe the three thowfand ATHENIANS that were taken prisoners at that overthrow. were condemned by the counsell to be put to death : Lyfander calling Philocles, one of the Cantaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would judge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens fo cruell & wicked counsell. Philocles being nothing abashed to fee him selfe in that miserie, aunswered him. Accuse not them that have no judge to heare their cause: but Philodes esfine the goddes have geven thee grace to be conqueror, doe with vs, as we would have done fine the with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had fayd fo, he went to washe him felfe, and discussion. then put on a faver cloke vpon him, as if he should have gone to some feast; and went luftely the formest man to execution, leading his contrie men the way as Theophrasias wryteth. After Chisdone, Lylander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the fea coast, where he commanded fo many ATHENIANS as he founde, that they should get them to ATHEN'S, letting them understand that he would not pardone a man of them, but but them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the willes of ATHENS, bicause he might so much the sooner famish them for lacke of virtells for otherwise they would have troubled him fore, if they had had wherewithall to have maintayned a long fiege. But in all the cities as he passed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kinds of gouernment, he left in every one of them aLACED EMONIAN Captaine or gouernor, with a counfell oftenne officers, of them that had bene before in league and amity with him: the which he did as well in the cities that had ever bene confederates and frendes ynto the LACED & MONIANS, as in them that not long before had bene their enemies. So he went fayling all alongest the coastes, fayer and softely making no haste, stablishing in manner a generall principality ouer all GREECE. For he did not make them officers that were the richelt, the nobleft, or honesteft men, but fuch as were his frendes, out of those tribes which he had placed in every citie: & to them he gave authority to bunish. and reward such as they liked of, and would be present him selfe in persone to helpe them to Lylanders put those to death, whome they would execute, or otherwise expulse or banish their contrie, onety.

But this gave the GREECIANS small hope of good or gratious government vider the full of

when he compared the LACED EMONIANS, vnto tauerners wines, faying : that they had geuenthe GREECIANS atalt of the sweete drinke of libertie, and that afterwardes they had of the Lacemingled it with vineger. For, the tast they gave the GREECIANS of their government from demoniana the beginning, was very fharpe vnto them: bicause Lysander tooke the rule and authority of government out of the peoples handes, and gave it vino a fewe of the boldell, and most feditions men in enery citie. Thus having spent a great time in this voyage, to make these alterations the fent newes before to LACED & MON, that he was comming with two hundred falle. Hefpake also with the kinges Agis and Paulanias, in the contry of ATTICA, perswading him felfe that he should winne the city of ATHENS at the first affault. But when he saw his expectation failed, & that the ATHENTANS did valliantly refift him: he returned once agains with his fleete into Asia, where he made an end of chaunging and altering the maner of gouern-

These words moned all the hearers with copassion, so that the most parte of them thought The seems it were too great a frane to destroy so noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wife implicks softemen,& great persones. Wherefore Lysander, when the ATHENIANS had submitted the selues and their cruell bearts. altogether to his will, caused all the women players of pipes or shalmes to come out of the ciry, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne campe also, and with the found them topin.

And furthermore, he would not fuffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their citie, their houses, and landes, vnto shippe mai. fters, officers of gallies, and galley flaues, that had bene in the warres with him. But thereinthe LACED EMONIANS were against him, and this was the first thing that they did forbid himelethey restored the SESTIANS, against his will, vnto their landes and goodes againe. But as the GREE CIANS were very much offended, to see the partes Lysander played: so were they all very glad againe, to fee these others which he afterwardes did. For he restored the ÆGINETESA. gaine to their landes and houses, who had bene put from them a long time. He restoredallo the MELIANS, and the SCION EIANS to their landes againe, which the ATHENIANS hadge. ten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyfander being aductifed that the citizens and inhabitantes of ATHENS were pinched fore for lacke of vittells, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PIREA: by meanes whereof he kept the citie fo straight Athense Ly. that he made them yeelde vppon such condicions as he him selfe would. Howbeit there are certaine LACED EMONIANS that fay, Ly ander wrote vnto the EPHORES: the city of ATHERS is taken. And that the Ephors wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but tale deuised to make the matter seeme better: for in deede the capitulacions which the Enter ri sent vnto him, were these. The Lordes of the counsell of LACED EMON have thus decreed that ye doe rase the fortification of the hauen of PIREA. That ye do ouerthrow also the lone wall that joyneth the hauen to the citie. That ye yeeldevp and redeliuer all the cities which ye doe holde, and content your felues with your lines and contry only. This doing, ye shall have peace, so that ye performe our demaundes. That ye shall receive those which are banished for the number of thippes, ye shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The ATHENIANS. the Athenias. greed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counsell of Theramenes, the some of Agnon. Who when a young orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were To bold to dare to doe, or fay, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themistocles had done be foretime, to affent vnto the LACED EN ONIANS, that the walle which he built in despited them, should by their comaundement now be rafed: he aunswered him openly againe, your man, my frend, I doe nothing contrary to Themistocles doinges. For like as he heretofore did build the walle, for the fafety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHERS at that time: euen so doe we that are here nowe, for the selfe same cause plucke it downeand rase it. And if it be true that walles doe make cities happy, then it must needes follow that the city of Sparta which neuer had any walles, should be the vnfortunatest of all other. So Lefanaer having received all the ATHENIANS thippes buttwelve, & the walles of the city allow vie them at his pleasure: on the fixteenth day of march on which day in olde time the ATHE MIANS had wonne the battell by fea, within the straight of SALAMINA, against the king of PERSIA) he counselled them straight to chaunge the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruelously offended withall. Whereuppon Life der fent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made between them for that their walles were yet standing the tenne dayes being expired in which they had promised to ouerthrowe them : and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the de ! termination of the counsell, howe they should be vsed, that had broken the articles and couenaunts of the first peace. Other say, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberacion of the counfell of their confederates, that is to fay: whether they should altogether destroy the city, and make the inhabitantes thereof, flaues, and bondmen or no. In this counfell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should viter ly rafe the city. & make the contry a defert : fo that it should neuer after serue for other thing. but for pasturage of beastes. But during this dyet & counsell, there was a banket made, whereunto all the Captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a Phocian, a finger of fonges, that fang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Post Eurspides, which beganne in this forte.

Neuerthelesse, at the earnest fute of Lylander frendes that stoode against it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the counsell, that the money should remaine in the city, and ordained that it should be currant onely but for that favres of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any private man did either lockern or kepe any money, that he should suffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his laws a feared gold and filuer, and not the couetousnes and auarice which the goldeand filuer bring. eth with it. The which was not taken away fo much, prohibiting private men to have it: asig was ingendred only by a common tolleracion of getting it. For, the profit which they fawer brought withall, made it to be esteemed and desired. For it was vnpossible they should desired a thing privately for ynprofitable, which they faw reckened of commonly, as a thing very ne ceffary: and that they thould thinke it would not ferue their turne privately, feeing it fo commonly esteemed and desired. But we are rather to thinke, that private mens manners are conformed according to the common vies and customes of cities: then that the faultes and viess of private men doe fill cities and common weales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the partes are marred & corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill then e disorder in a that the partes corrupted should drawe the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary, the faultes of a parte destroyed, which might be prejudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimestedreffed and corrected by thother partes, whole and entier. But they that tooke this refolucion in their counsell at that time, to have money in the common wealth: made feare of punishment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houses, to keepe that no money should come in to them. But all this while they made no inwarde prouision, to kepetheen try of their foules from all passion & greedy defires of money: but to the contrary, they made them all to have a couetous defire to be rich, as if it were a great and honorable thing. But for that we have hertofore in other places reproved the LACED EMONIANS. And moreover Isfander caused a statue of brasse to be made like him selfe of the spoile he had gotten of thesis mies, to fet it vp in the citie of DELPHES, and for every private Captaine of the gallies in like case: and the two starres of Castor & Pollux in golde besides, which vanished away a little he fore the battell of Leuctres, and no man knewe what became of them. Againe, in the chartber of the treasory of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a galley made of gold and inory, of two cubittes long, which Cyrus fent vnto him after the victory he had wonned fea, of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the historiographer borne at Def-PHES, Wryteth, that the felfe fame Lyfander had left there to be kept fafe, a tallent of filuer, two & fifty Minas, and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other historiographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lyfander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GREECIAN was before him: caried a greater porte!

For, to gratifie his frendes and familiars, he gave them abfoliute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacific and aspeafehis anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all poffibilitienfortdon. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the city of MILET WILL where tearing leaftthey would flie that tooke parte with the people, & bicaufe he would have them appeare that hid them selues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would doe them no hurt avail. He and ground caused great murders of people to also be done in other cities: for he did not only pur them to starting death that had privatly offended him, but numbers besides, onely to satisfic and rendinge the private quarrells, enmitties and couetouines of his frendes, whom he had in every place. And therefore was Eteocles LACED & MONIAN greatly commended for his faying schare GREECE Eteocles could not abide two Lylanders. Theophrastus wryteth also, that the very like was spoken of Al- worder of Lycibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his infolency and vaine glory that men milliked: but in Ly (ander, a seuere nature, and sharpe condicions, that made his power fearfull & intollerable. Neuertheleffe, the LACED EMONIANS passed ouerall other complaintes exhibited against him: fauing when they heard the complaints of Pharmabazais. D who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and injuries Lylander had done him fooyling and destroying the contry vnder his government. Then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his frendes and Captaines Thorax put to that had ferued with him; and finding that he had both gold and filuer in his house contrary feeding the to the law, put him to death. And to him felfe they fent immediatly that which they call Sovtala, (as who would fay, the scrolle wrytten apon a rounde staffe) commaunding him that he should retorne immediatly apon receive thereof. The Scytala is in this force. Afterwardes when they have bound them fast together, then they wryte vppon the parchment thus rolled what they will. and when they have done wryting, vnfolde it, and fende it to their Generall, who can not elfe possibly read it to know what is writte, (bicause the letters are not ioined together nor follow inorder . but are scattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rowle of worde which was geuen him at his departure. And then wreathing the scrowle of parchment about it which he receaueth, the folding and wreathes of the parchement falling iust into the selfe samoplace as they were first folded: the letters also come to joyne one with an other, asthetonght to doe. F This little fcrowle of parchment also is called as the rowle of wodde, Scytala: even as we commonly fee in many places that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchement scrowle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the contrie of

The Ephori hauing this letter, they shewed it vnto him. Then did Lylander plainly see, that the common project

Thereuppon he went home to his house maruelously troubled. But within few days after returning to the pallace agains to speake with the Lords of the counsell, he told them that he must needes make a voyage vnto the temple of Impiter Ammon, to discharge certaine facilities which he had vowed and promised to him before he had wonne the battells. Some say, thatin deede Impiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did besiege the city of the Approp IANS, in the contry of THRACIA, and that by his commaundement he raifed the fiege, and charged them of the city, that they should thanke Iupiter Ammon, and doe facrifice vinohim by reason whereof, they thinke that he ment good faith, when he fued for licence to make this voyage into Libra, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most parted idea. tainely beleue that he made fute to goe this iorney, for a cloke and colour only to absent felfe, bicause he seared the Ephores, and that he coulde not endure the yoke and subjection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commaunded. And this was the true cause of his sute to goe this voyage, much like vnto a horse taken out of a freshe me flure and goodly meadowes, to bring him into a stable, & make him to be iorneved as here before. Neuertheleffe, Ephorus writeth an other cause, the which I will recite hereafter. Inthe end, Lyfander having hardly obtained licence, tooke shippe, and crossed faile. But during is absence, the kinges of LACED EMONTEMEMbring that he kept all the cities at his command dement, by meanes of the frendes he had in every city, whom he had made chiefe governor of the fame, & that by their meanes he came in maner to be absolute prince ouer all Greece they tooke vppon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into the handes of the people, and also to put downe his frendes whome he had stablished there. And hereupon fell out great infurrection againe. For first of all, they that were banished from A-I THENS, having furprifed and taken the castell of Phyla apon the sodaine, did set apon the thirty gouernors tyrans (whom Lylander had placed there) and ouercame them in battell. Whereuppon Lyfander straight returned to Sparta, & perswaded the LACED EMONIANS to refere the gouernment to the number of a few, and to punish the insolency of the people. So by his procurement, they lent first a hundred tallents vnto the thirty tyrans for an aide to maintain this warre, and appointed Lyfander him felfe generall. But the two kinges of Spart a emigrag him, and fearing least he should take the city of ATHEN S againe: they determined that oned them would go. Whereupon Paufanias went thither immediatly, who in apparaunce feemed to maintaine the tyrannes against the people: but in effect, he did his indeuor to appeale this warre, for feare least Lysander by meanes of his frends and followers should once againe come to have the city of ATHENS in his power, the which he might eafily doe. And thus havings-

e mong them, he pluckt up the roote of Lyfanders ambition. But shortly after the Abdinians rebellingagaine against the LACED & MONIAN S. Pausanias him selfe was reproved bicause he welded so much to the boldnes and insolency of the people, which were brideled and restrained before, by the authority of the small number of gouernors : and to the contrary, they gaue Lylander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens mindes and to content them, neither with fond oftentation of glory, but feuerely, for the profit and commodity of Sparta. It is true he would geue great wordes, and was terrible to them that relisted him. As he aunswered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their confines with Lylanders the LACED EM ONIAN S, and feemed to alleage the best reasons. Even they (sayd he) that shall serrible words proue the stronger hereby, showing the his sword: shalbe they that shal pleade their cause best for their confines. An other time, when a MEGARIAN had tolde his minde boldly enough in open counfell, he aunswered him: thy wordes (good frend) had neede of a city, meaning therby that he was of too meane a towne to vie fo great words. And to the BOEOTIAN sallo, who were indout to professe them selves frends or enemies: he sent vnto the, to know if he should paffe through the contry with his pykes vpwardes or downewardes. And when the Corin-THIANS also were reuolted from their allyance, he brought his army harde vnto their walles: but when he sawe his men were afrayed, and made cursey whether they should goe to the asfault or not by chaunce fpying a hare comming out of the towne ditches, he fayd vnto them: Areyenot ashamed to be asrayed to goe and assault your enemies that are so cowardly and flothfull, as hares doe keepe their formes at ease within the circuite of their walles? Now king Agu being deceased, he left behinde him his brother Agesilaus, and his supposed sonne Leotythides. Wherefore, Lylander that had loued Agesilans aforetime, gaue him counsell to stande Lylander defor the right of the crowne, as lawefull heire and next of the blood, difcending of the race of princeth Lea-Hereiles bicaufe it was suspected that Leotychides was Alcibiades sonne, who secretly had kept kingedone. Times Agis wife, at what time he was banished out of his contry, and came then to remaine in Spart A. And Agis selfe also, concluding by reckening of the time of his absence, that his wife coulde not be with childe by him: made reckening of Leotychides, (and had openly shewedit all the rest of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his sonne, vntill such time as falling ficke of that difease whereof he died, he was caried to the city of HEREA. And therelying in his death bed, at the humble fute of Leotychides him felfe, and partely at the infant request of his frendes who were importunate with him: he did acknowledge Leotychides for his fonne in the presence of divers, whome he prayed to be witnesses vnto the Lordes of LACED EMON, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his sonne, Which they alldid in fauor of Leotychides. For all that, Agesilaus tooke it apon him, by the support and maintenaunce of Lylanders fauor. Howebeit, Diopithes a wife man, and knowen to be skilfull in auncient prophecies, did great hurt to Agesilaus side, by an auncient oracle which he allea-gedagainst a defect Agesilaus had, which was his lamenes. O Spartan people you, wwhich beare high havvty hartes, And looke a loft: take heede I (ay, looke well unto your martes: . Least whiles you stande upright, and guide your state by grace, Some halting kingdom privily, come creeping in a pace. By that meanes might you moue, great troubles, carke and care, And mischiefes heape upon your head, before you be avvare. And plonged should you be, even over head and eares, VVith wealt of wearres, which here on earth doth perish many teares.

Many by occasion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides parte: but Lylander declared vnto them, that Dispithes did not confter the meaning of the oracle well. For God, fayed he cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that should come to be king of LACED EMON: but in deede, the crowne and kingdome should halte and be lame, if bastardes not lawfully begotten, should come to raigne ouer the true naturall iffue and right line of Hercules. By these perswalions, Lylander with his great countenaunce and authority besides, wanne all men to his ing. Aseful opinion: fo that Agesilaus by this meanes was proclaimed king of LACED EMON. This done,  Lyfander beganne straight to counsell him to make warres in A s 1 A, putting him in hope that he should destroy the kingdome of Parsin, and should come to be the greatest man of the world. Moreouer, he wrote vnto his frendes in the cities of A sta, that they should fend with the LACED & MONIANS to require king Agefilaus for their generall, to make warres against the barbarous people. Which they did, and fent Ambassadors purposely vnto SPARTA to sue the they might haue him : the which was no leffe honor procured vnto Agefilans by Lylandin meanes, then that he did, in making him to be chosen king. But men ambitious by nature, he ing otherwise not vnapt nor vnsit to commaunde, have this impersection: that through the iealousie of glory, they doe commonlie enuie their equalles, the which doth greatly hinder them for doing any notable thinges. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue: whose service and meanes might helpe them to doe great matters. Thus Agesiland being chosen generall of this enterprise, tooke Lyfander with him in this iorney, amongest the thirty counsellers which were genen vnto him to affish him: and made speciall choyce of him, as by whose counsell he hoped most to be gouerned, and to have him neerest about him, as his chiefest frende. But when they were arrived in Asia, they of the contry having no acquaintaunce with Agelilaus, feldome spake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, having know wen Lylander of long time, they followed him, and waited uppon him to his tent or lodging some to honor him, bicause they were his frendes, others for feare, bicause they did million him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that shall play the person of some messenger or servaunt, shalle the best player. and shall have the best voyce to be heard about all others: and to the contrary, that he which hath the royall bande about his heade, and the scepter in his hande, a man doth scantheare him speake. Euen so fell it out then : for all the dignitie due vnto him that commaundethall was shewed only vnto the counseller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royal name only of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinkes that this vndifcreete and im-portunate ambition of Lylander, did well deserve reproofe perhappes, to make him only to be cotented with the second place of honor next vnto the king. But for Agessaus againe, through extreame couetousnes and icalousse of glory, to cast Lysander altogether of and to set so light by his frende and benefactor, that furely became not him neither. For first of all, Agesilaus neuergaue Lyfander occasion to doe any thinge, neither did commit any matter of weight vnm him, that might be honorable for him: but which is worst of all, if he perceived that he had prinie grudge to Lyfander. taken any mens califes in hand, and that he did fauor them, he did alwayes fende them backen againe into their contry, denying their fute, without that they coulde obtaine any thing they fued for, leffe then the meanest persones that could have come, extinguishing Lysanders credit by litle, and litle, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lylander Lyfanders perceiuing howe he was thus refused and rejected in all thinges, seing that the countenaunce and fauor which he thought to shew vnto his frendes, fell out hurtfull vnto them:left of tolo licite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to followe him, but to go to the king, and vnto those that could doe them better pleasure then himselfe, and specially those that honored them. When they heard that, many defisted to trouble him any more in matters of importaunce, but not to doe him all the honor they could, and continued still to accompanie him, when he went out to walke, or otherwife to exercise himselfe king Agefilait be but in respect of straungers eyes that looke apon as both. After this talke between them, vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge & commission in the warres, oftentimes vnto very meane souldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lysander surueyor generall of all the ordinary prouision of vittells, and distributer of sless. And then mocking the Io NIAN's that did honor him fo much : let them go now, fayd he, and honor my flesh distributer. Wherefore, Ly ander seeing it high time to speake: went vnto Agesilaus, and tolde him in few wordes after the LACONIAN manner: Truely Agefilaus, thou haft learned wello abase thy frendes. In deede sayed he againe, so haue I, when they wilbe greater then my selfe and to the contrary, they that maintaine and increase my honor and authority, it is reasonthat I esteeme of them. Yea mary, sayd Lysander, but perhappes I have not done as thou sayst. Yet I pray thee geue me fuch an office, as I may be least hated, & most profitable for thee: though

A destilant fent him his Lieutenaunt into the contry of HELLES PONT, where byfander ftill kens this anger fecret in his hart against him, but for all that, did not leave to dod all that he could for the benefit of his mafters affaires. As amongest many other thinges, he caused a Parsuan Captaine called Spithridates, to rebell against his master, who was a vallant men of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army also which he brought with him vnto and gefilam. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iorney. Wherefore he nes nuned againe to Sparta not long after, with little honor, being marueloufly grieued and offended with Agefilaus; and hating more then before, all the state and government of the citie of Spart A: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time in sand thought uppon, concerninge the alteracion of gouernment, and his enterprise was this. An feelesh innoned againe into the contrie of PELOPONNESVS, the greatest number and chiefest of themamongelt the offpring and iffue of Hercules, who were mingled with the Donians, and return flater Sparia dwelled in the city of Sparta: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of fuccession to the crowne, fauing two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agrades. The other The Families families, albeit they were all for nobility of blood descended out of one selfe house, ver hat of the kinger thorno more right nor interest vnto the realme, then the residue of the people: for the digni? of Lacedanesehat were attained vnto by vertue, were genen vnto the inhabitauntes that could deferme Exerciontides, and the Agiades, the prerogative that the kinges should be chosen onely out of one of those two houses, and to cast it apon the offpring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not only have enlarged that prerogative vnto the iffue of Hercules, but vnto all the nanirall Spart ans also: bicause that Hercules race should not only desire this reward of honor-but even they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equal with the gods inhonor. For he douted not, but if they would dispose the crowne in this forte, that there was noman in the city of SPART A that should sooner be chosen king then him selfe: wherupon he ter, he conned an oration without booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnaffens, made him for this

E and auniwers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwardes, he woulde have wonne the Nunne also of the temple of Dopons with money by Phèreèles practife. And that he being rejected by them both, went lastly vinto the temple of Impiter Ammon: and that there he spake vnto the priestes, and offered them great store of money for the same purpose. But

them. Lalander then being one of those which was discended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the crowne: when he saw him selfe aloft; and walled to great honor through his famous actes and merites, and that he had wonne many frendes, and great C credit and authority by dealing in matters of the state; it grieved him much, to see that their which were no nobler then him felfe, should be kinges in that city, which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not have so much power as to take from these two houses, the purpole. But afterwardes weying with him felfe, that fo great and straunge a chaunge as he would bring in, had neede of some better and stronger helpe: he beganne to frame a deuild as they fay to move the people by, much after the manner they vie in tragedies, framing en- Lyfonder degines to bring some god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained in racket, or coruention. He deutsed certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleans rethoricke would repetit sould fland him in no fleade, if first of all he did not fill the citizens hartes with some supersticion & sayers with feare of the goddes, that he might bring them afterwardes more eafily vnto reason. And Ephorue fayeth, that he proued first to corrupt the Nunne with money, that general all the oracles they were fo offended with Lyfander, that they fent men of purpole to Spantato accuse him. that he would have corrupted them with money. The counsell clearing Lylander of this accufation, the Librars his accusers at their departing sayd: we will one day judge more justly. then you my Lordes of LACEDEMON have done now, when you shall come to dwell in our contry of LIBYA: supposing there was an auncient prophecy that sayd, the LACED EMONI-ANS one day (hould come to dwell in the contry of Libya. But we shall doe better to wryte

p the whole flory at large of this practife, futtelty, and malicious deuile, which was no matter of imall importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall proposition there were many great coniectures and presuppositions, & many long circumstances to bring it to confained desile clusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, delivering that which an historiographe and philosopher both hath wrytten. There was in the marches of the realme of Pontant man that faved the was gotten with childe by spolle, the which many (as it is to be thought would not beleve at all, and many also did beleve it : fo that the beinge delivered of a goodle fonne, diverse noble men and of great estate were carefull to bring him vp, and to have him taught. This childe. I know not whereuppon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lyfander fee change the plat of his deuile from thence, added to all the rest of him selfe, to goe on withhis practife. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this leaft me ping our armor of the birth of this childe, without any suspicion gathered out of the interest of this rumor. And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which therei. fperfed abroade through the city of Spart A, to wit: that the prieftes of the temple kepties cree bookes of very auncient oracles, which they them felues durft not touch nor handle new ther might any man read them, onleffe he were begotten of the feede of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priestes that kept these papers to that by fome fecret marke & token which they had amongeft them: & thereby being known for Apolloes fonne, he might then take the bookes, & read the auncient reuelacions & pronte cies of the fame. Thefe things prepared in this forte, there was order taken that Silenus (hand) come and aske for these bookes as though he were the some of Apollo: and that the prieses which were print to this practife, should make as though they did diligently examine himes euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all they should deliver these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene in deede Apolloes sonne: and that he should openly read them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the restorte prophecies that he should read that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift wai framed, touching the kingdome of LACED EMONIA: that it was better, and meetelier for the SPARTANS they thould choose them for their kinges, whome they found the meetelt mened all their magistrates. But when Scienus was come of full age, and brought into GREECE of purpose to performe this practife, all the mistery was marde by the fainte heart of one of the players and companions of Lylander, who holpe him to countenaunce this deuise: who when the matter flouid have taken effect, throncke for feare, and let the mifterie alone. This not withstanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lylanders lifetime, till after his death. For he dyed before king Azefilaw returned out of Asia, being fallen into warres with Box o Tia before his] death, or rather having him felfe made GREECE to fall into warres. They doe reporte its ther way, and some lay the fault apon him, other apon the THEBANS, and other apon them both : and they burden the THEBANS withall, bicause they did vtterly ouerthrowe the com-Dimers causes mon facrifices which Agesilaus made in the city of AV LIDE. And they say also, that Andreis des and Amphitheus did raise this warre among the GREBCIANS, being before corrupted with money by the king of Persiato bring warres apon the Laced Emonians in Greechand beganne to inuade and destroy the contry of the Phoc IANS. Other fay that Lyfander was very angry with the THEBANS, bicause they onely of all other their confederates did aske the tenth parte of all the spoyle which was wonne in the warre against the ATHENIANS : and that they were not pleased that Lysander had sent the money away vnto Spart A. But aboue all Lysander E did malice them most, bicause they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to bedelivered from thoppression of thirty tyrannes, whom he had stablished governors in A THENG and in whose fauor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACED EMONIANS hadow dained by a common edict: that they that were banished and did flee from ATHENS, might lawefully be taken and apprehended in what place soeuer they fled vnto, and that whosener should resist or let them to do it, they should be proclaimed rebells, & open enemies vnto the LACED EMONIANS, Againe to contrary this edict, the THEBANS made an other very like, &

that every house and city through the contry of BOEOTIA, should be open for the ATHENIA

ANS that would come thither, & that he that would not helpe a banished man from ATHER, also if there were any souldiers that went ynto ATHENS, through the contrie of BOROTIA, clere and sweete to drinke) hath notwithstanding (I can not tell by what meanes) a collour like wine and not farre from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALI-ARTIANS do alleage, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that parte, & doe thew his fepulchre there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the monumer of Alemena, which was buried (as they fay) in that place, & was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIAR-TIANS, stirred not vntill they sawe that Ly fander with the first of his troupe was neere vnto the towne walles: & then opening the gates on the fodaine, they made a falle out youn Lyfander, 19fander &flue him with his foothfaier & a few other, bicause the most part of the voward fled, into the flaine by the stregth of the battel. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue the not ouer so, but followed the so valiantly that they brake their order, & made the all flie through the moutaines, after they had flaine three thousand of the in the field: so were there three hundred THEBANS also saine there, who followed their enemies to fiercely, till they recourred straight narrow waies, of great strength for them. These three hudred were in maner all those that were suspected in Thebes to favor the LACED & MONIAN'S fecretly: wherfore, for the defire they had to take away this opinio fro their citizens, they hazarded thefelues to no purpofe, & were cast away in this chase. King Paufunias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going fro PLATERS vnto THE SPIES, & went on further, marching still in battel ray towards ALIARTE, where Thrasphulus also arrived at the selfe same time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS fro THEBES. And when Paulanias was purposed to fend to aske licece of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had flaine, to thintent to bury them: the olde SPART ANS that were in his army, milliking it much, at the first were angry in them selves. But afterwardes they went vnto the king him selfe, to tell him

A that the THEBANS should not see nor heare it. This was no diffimulation to speake of . that they (hould ordaine thinges with so gentle wordes, and so meete for the people of GREECE, and then that the dedes should not aunswer vnto their edicts & proclamations. For Thrasphulus, and his fellowes of the conspiracie, who kept the castell of Phyla, they departed from THERES, with armor and money, and the THERANS did helpe them to beginne and practife their enterprise to secretly, that it was not discouered. These were the causes why Lylander was fo earnestly bent against the Thebans, & his choller being so extreame, by reason of his melancholines that grewe dayly apon him more and more through his age, he folicited the Epho RES fo, that he perswaded them to sende a garrison thither : and him selfe taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iorney straight with his men. But afterwardes they sent kinge 13/anders R Peulanias also with an army thither, who was to fetche a great compasse about to enter innothe contric of BOROTIA, by mount Cithæron : and Lylander shoulde goe to meete him cithæron derwent, he tooke the city of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded them selues to him as some as he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he spoyled:

& from thence he wrote vnto king Paulanias, that departing from PLATERS, he should march directly to the city of ALIARTE, where he would not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne walles. These letters were intercepted by certaine skowtes of the THEBANS, who met with the messenger that caried them. Thus the THEBANS having intelligence of their purpose, left their citie in custodie vnto the ATHENTANS who were come to freede, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lyfander, and put halfe their men into the citie. Now for Lylander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men apon a hill which is nere to the city, and there to tary the comming of king Paulanias. But afterwards, when he fawe that the day was farre spent, and that he came not, he could tary no lenger, but arming him felfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went ynto the city. In the meane feason, the The BANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hande, did fet vppon Lylanders rerewarde of his army against the foun-

But not with standing all these wordes of the old men, king Passania feeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the Thebans in battell, now that they had goe ten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lyfander lay hard by the walls of ALLARTE and that he could not come to take it away without great daunger, although they should win the battell: he fent a herauld to the enemies. And having made truce for certaine dayes, he led his army away, and tooke vp Ly anders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confynes of BOEOTIA, within the territory of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his a tombe remaineth apon the high way, goinge from DELPHES vnto the city of CHERONEL Thus Paulanias campe being lodged there, it is fayd there was a Pho CIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, fayd that the enemies came to gene a charge vponthem. as Lylander had passed the Oplites. Thother wondring at that, there was a Spart an a ve ry frend of Lylanders by, having heard all their talke, asked him what that was which heral led Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? aunswered the Pro-CIAN to him againe. Euen there it was where the enemies did ouerthrow the first of our men which were flaine in the fieldes: for the river that runneth by the walles of the city, is called Oplites. The SPART AN hearing that, burst out of weping for forrow, saying: then I see it is you possible for a man to auoyde his destinie. For Lyfander aforetime had an oracle that tolde him

Lyfander, take good heede, come not I thee aduife: Neere Oplites that rivers banckes in any kinde of wife. Nor neere the Dragon he, wwhich is the earth her fonne, VV ho at the length wwill thee affault, and anthy backe wwill roune.

Howebeit some take it, that this river of Oplites is not that which passeth by the walles of ALIARTE, but it is the river that runneth neere vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the river of Phliarus, hard by the city: and they fay that in oldetime it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Isomantus. He that flue Lylander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorne, who caried a Dragon painted apon his target: and this was that which the oracle of likelyhoode n did signifie. They say also, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESUS, the THEBANS fine L) fander. had an oracle from the teple of Apollo Ismenias: which oracle did prophecy the battell which they wanne by the castell of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE also, which was think yeares after that. The effect of that oracle was this.

When thou thy nets shalt spread, the vvolues for to intrappe: Bevvare thou come not neere unto, a litle hill by happe, Of Orchalide. Nor neere, to any his confynes:

towardes mounte Helicon. Lyfander being flaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death foill, that they would have condemned king Paulanias of treason by law: who durft not abide the rivall but fled vnto the citie of Thoma, where he ended the rest of his life within the sanctuaries the temple of Minerua. When Lyfander was dead, his pouertie appeared to the world which made his vertue farre more famous, than when he lived. For then they fawe, that for all the gold & filuer which had passed through his hands, for all his great authority & countenaunce that he had caried, and for all that fo many cities & townes did come to honor him, & briefly, for al that he had so great & puissant a kingdom in maner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increase his house with so much, as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we should F rather beleue when he praifeth, then when he discommendeth for commonly he takethmore delite to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuned not longe after, as Ephorus writeth, that the

A LACED EMONIANS and their confederats fel at variance together, wherepon Enfanders letters were to be seene that were in his house. Kinge Agesilaus goinge thither to peruse them, amongest other writinges, founde the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnassem which Lysander Lylanders had prepared to perswade the Spart ans to chaunge their gouernment, and to declare vnto counsell for them that they shoulde renoke the prerogative which the Eurytiontides and the Agrades had; during of the that the kinges of SPARTA could not be chosen but out of those two families, and to leve the prerogative at liberty, that the chiefest magistrats might be laufully chosen kings of Sparta. Anellaus frood indifferent to have thewed this oratio openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might see what manner a citizen Lylander had bene in his harte. But Latratidas, a graue wife Lacratidas man. & presidentat that time of the counsel of the Ephori, would not suffer him faying that he wifdom for-B (houlde not digge Lyfander out of his grave againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that hearing to was so passingly well, and eloquently penned to perswade. Thus we see, that at SPARTA there was a life, late marinunithment for them that did not mary, or that maryed too late, or that maried ill: and vnto age, and ill this punishment were they most subject, that sought great matches for couetousnes of goods. maine pro-This is all we have to wryte of Lyfanders life and actes.

THE LIFE

Veius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricias, who be the noble Syllaes kinmen & gentlemen of Rome: & there was one of his auncesters called red Rufines, that obtained the dignity of Conful. He notwithflanding his Confulshippe, wanne more dishonor by defame; then he obtained honor by dignity of Confull. For they finding in his house above ten powndes worth of plate, contrary to the lawe at that time expressely forbidding it: he was expulsed the Senare and lost his place there atter which dishonor once received, his iffue never rose, nor yet recouered it . And Sylla him felfe had very little left him by his father : fo

that in his youth he was faine to hyer an other mans house, & fat at a small rent, as afterward a he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they faw him richer then they thought he had defe ued. For when he gloried & boasted of the victory at his returne from the warres of A FRIEL Syllaes hone- there was a noble man that fayd vnto him: why, how is it possible thou shouldest be an honest man, that having nothing left thee by thy father, thou arte now come to have fo much Now though Rome had left her auncient inflice and purenes of life, wherewith the brought vo her people in former times, and that their hartes were poyloned with couctous defire of vainely perfluous delites: yet notwithstanding, it was as fowle a reproche to them that did not main. taine them selves in the poverty of their fathers, as vnto them that did consume their paris mony, and bring all to naught which their parentes had left them. But afterwardes also when he carried the whole sway in Rome, and that he had put so many men to death: a free manbe. ing borne of the flaues infranchifed, & being ready to be throwen downe the rocke Tarpeian bicause he had saued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death wherefoeuer they were found: cast it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had lived and dwelt together

vppermost roomes of the same house, & Sylla three thowsand for all the neathermost roomes beneath. So that between both their wealthes, there was but onely two thowfande and fiftie Drachmas of ATHENS difference. And this is that we finde in wryting of his first weakh. At Syllaes flafor his stature and persone, that appeareth sufficiently by the statues and images that were made for him, which yet remaine. But for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull redden and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to beholde. For he was cop of

It is not amisse to search out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward market it is put to the and tokens. It is fayd also that he was so naturally geuen to mocke & least, that being a young fire, and therman vnknowen, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tomblers, but fore Syllaceus still eating and tippling with them in dissolute manner. And afterwardes also when he was in uia, signifieth his chiefest authoritie, he would commonly eate and drinke with the most impudent leasters and scoffers, and all such rakehelles, as made profession of counterfeate mirth, & would strike h with the baddest of them to geue the finest mockes: wherin he did not only a thing vncome for his yeres, & dishonored the maiesty of his office & dignity, but therby also grew carelest & negligent in matters of great importance, wherunto he should have taken good regard. For after he was once fette at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight, Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very active, painefull, and fewere yet falling into fuch copany by drinking, bowling, & making good chere, he fodainly became an other maner of man. So that without all compasse of modesty and judgement, he wastoo familiar and conversaunt with players, leasters, tumblers, and daunsers: who when they had Syllaes voinprnousnes.

him in that vaine, might doe what they would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of letchery, whereunto he was greatly geuen, and eafily drawen after loue and fi pleasure: in such forte, as his gray heares could not restraine his voluptuous life. His vnlawfull lufting loue beganne in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire vntill his latter age . For at the first he loued Nicepolis a rich curtifan: and frequenting her company by oft accesse, and besides that he spentile prime of his beauty and youth in feasting her with great delight and paffing pleasure, sheafterwardes became in loue with him, so that when she dyed, she made Sylla her heire of all she had. He was heire also vnto his mother in lawe, who loued him as her owne begotten some and by these two good happes he was stept up to pretie wealth. Afterwardes beinge choken Quæstor (to say treasorer) the first time that Marius was Consult, he embarked with himin his iorney into A FRICKE, to warre with kinge Ingurthe. When he was arrived at the campe, he shewed him selfe a man of great service in all other thinges, but in this especially, thathe could wifely vie the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wanne Bocchuckingeof

A she NAMIDIANS to be his fast and faithfull frende: whose Ambassadors, that scaped from a company of NVMIDIAN theeues he curreoutly entertained, and having genen them good, The coufe of

Worefentes, fent them backe againe with a fafe conuoy. Now concerninge kinge Bocchus, he Bocchus fredby prejentes, that the both hated and feared king Inquirthe his sonne in law insomuch, that after he side was ouercome in battell, and came to him for fuccor, Boschies practifed treaton against him. and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Ingurthe should be taken by Sylla, then by him felfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marins, of whom having received a finall numher of fouldiers to accompany him, (without respect of perillor daunger) went and commitred him selfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take an other a considering also that the king whom he trusted was so visual of his word, even visto his negrest frends and con-Aderates. Now Bocchus having Ingurthe and Sylla both in his power, and brought him felfe to that pinch that of necessity he mult betray the one or the other:after he had taken good breath to resolue which of the two he should deale withall, in thend went on with his first plat & deuiscof treason, and so delivered lugurthe into Syllaes handes. In deede Marius triumphed for Sylla by kinge raking of king Ingurthe: but his euill willers, for the fpight and grudge they bare him, did at Bocchus. mibute the glory and honor of Ingurthes taking wholy vnto Sylla. That fecretly went to Maxime Thonor of In harte and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from kings after abale, obscure, and vnknowen life to be knowen & well accepted of the people in Rome, and bed rate to rastalso what honor ment) became so ambitious and couetous of glory, that he caused the flort to be grauen in a ring, which he did ever after vie to weare & seale withall. Where king C. Recebus was delivering of Iugurthe unto Sylla, and Sylla also receiving Iugurthe prisoner. These thinges milliked Marins much: but notwithstanding, judging that Sylla was not lo much enuied as him felfe, he tooke him with him vnto the warres. Marine in his seconde Consulthin, made Sylla one of his Lieutenauntes: and in his third Consulhippe, he had charge under him of athors and footemen, and did many notable and profitable exploytes for him, When Syllaes noble was his Lieutenaunt, he tooke one Copillus, a generall of the GAVLES Techofages, And when deedes under hewas Colonell of a thowfande footemen, he brought the MARSIANS (a maruelous great Marius. contry of people in I TALLIE) and periwaded them to remaine good frendes, and confederates of the ROMAINES. For this his good feruice, he founde that Marine grewe in great milliking withhim, bicaufe from thence forth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occasion to D shewe good service: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising, Wherefore, Sylla afterwardes tooke Catulus Luctatius parte, who was companion with Marius in his Confulfhippe. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somwhat slacke and colde in marshall matters, which was the cause that in deede he did committe ynto Sylla all the special service and matters of weight in his charge: whereuppon he gaue him occasion not onely to increase his estimacion, but also his credit and power. For, by force of armes, he conquered the most parte Sillaes doings of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes : and Catulus campe under came lacking vittells, having commission, he made a maruelous great quantity of provision to be brought thither, infomuch as Catulus campe being plentifully vittelled, they fent their ftore & furplulage vnto Marius fouldiers, the which Sylla him felfe wry tethodid much miflike Marius. And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded upon so light occasion, The first cause was followed with citill warres, great effusion of blood, and with incurable factions and diffentions: that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confution of all the Roughan and Marius. flate and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wife man and one that forefaw the ruines of common weales, when he counfelled, and also commanned governors to flicambition, as a most pestilent and mortall furievnto them that are once interest withall, to be fled, as a Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the warres would have made mortal furie. his way open to preferrehim to some honorable office in the city of Rome: he was no some returned from the warres, but he would needes proue the peoples good willes ynto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that fued for the Prætorthippe of the gipy (that is tofay, the office of the ordinary judge that ministreth justice vnto the citizens but he was re-

thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassador of Arfaces, king of the PARTHIAN, THIANS. Now these two nations, the ROMAINES, and the PARTHIANS, were never frendered before: and that with other thinges shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the Park of the Par-THIANS came first to him by his meanes to seeke frendshippe with the ROMAINES. They fay, that receiving this Ambassador Orobazus, he made three chayres to be brought out, theore for king Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassador, and the third for him felle which he placed in the middest between them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaugar dience vnto the Ambassador: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwardes put Ordin zas to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maidly among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing him selfe state out of time, and to no purpose. We doe read that a soothsayer of Chaldra being in Order zu traine, having diligently viewed and confidered the phistognomy of Sylla and all his other mouinges and geftures of minde and body, to judge not by the clymate of the contry, but at cording to the rules of his arte whathis nature should be : all well considered of he saved that Sylla one day must needes come to be a great man, and that he marueled how he could suffer it that he was not even then the chiefest man of the worlde. VVhen Sylla was returned against money with him, contrary to the lawe, out of one of their confederates contry: howebeithe profecuted not his accufation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time, the enmity begonne be-

man. Notwithstanding, Sylladid not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done

Sylla accorded to Rome, one Cenforinus accused him of extorcion, that he had caried away a great summe of

twixt him and Marius, kindled againe vppon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partely to creepe further into the peoples fauor of Rome, and partely also for to gratifie Sylling gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carying tokens of triumphe, vnto the temple of Impiter Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Ingurthe, which he delivered into the handes of Sylla, being all of pure golde. This did so offende Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the city of Rome taking armes, had like to have brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederats of IT AL IN bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruelous great warre which fell out very daungerous, by fundry misfortunes and great losses to the Romaines, Marine didno notable exployee; whereby it appeareth that the vertue of warlike discipline hath neededs ftrong, lufty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, having done notable feruice, and obtain ned many profitable victories, wanne the fame and estimacion among the ROMAINES, of 41 noble fouldier, and worthy Captaine: and among thenemies them felues, of a most fortunate

Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHEN IANS with the whole discourse of his doings in his voyage the lavd vne

But Sylla to the contrary, did not only paciently abide their wordes down to that faved, he was a happy man, and fingularly beloued of fortune: but also increasinge this forement opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the goddes, did attribute the honor of his do forume the opinion, and goo, may a series of all ings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fanily, that the goddes did pro-honor of all his doingto. foer him in all his doinges. For he wrote him felfe in his commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hottely, according to the sodaine occasion offered, did better profoer with him, then those which by good aduise he had determined of. Furthermore, when he fand that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperity came rather by fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude it appears reth that he did wholly submit him selfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vponher: confidering that he did attribute it to the speciall grace and favor of the goddes, that he neuer difagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignineand authoritie as him selfe was . For where it was thought he woulde have bene a greate hinderer of his doings, he found him verie curteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reason of the societie of their office. And furthermore, in his comentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counfelled him to thincke nothing more cer- syllass belefe raine and affured, then that which the goddes should reueale vnto him, and commaunde him inhis nightes dreame. He wrytethallo that when he was fent with an army vnto the warres A france of the confederates, the earth fod ainly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediat - Fight appeared ly came a maruelous bright flame of fire that ascended up to the element. The wife men be-Ding asked their opinions about the same, made aunswere; that a very honest, and also a maruclous fayer man of complexion taking foueraine authoritie in his handes, thould pacific all tumultes and fedition which were at that time in Rome. Whereupon Sylla fayed it was him lelle whome the goddes ment, bicaufe that amongeft other things he had that fingular gift of beauty, that his heare was yellow as golde: and he was not ashamed to name him selfe an honeft man, after he had wonne fo many notable great victories. Thus have we fufficiently fooken of the trust he had in the fauor of the goddes. And furthermore, he seemed to be very stills fireweet contrary in his manners, and vnlike to him felfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he of condicion gaue as much more also in an other. Some he preferred without cause: and others he put downe without reason. He would be very gentle to them, of whome he would have ought: and vnto those that sought of him, he would stand much apon his honor, and looke for great ned and forgaue fuch faultes as were in no wife to be forgiuen. And afterwards againe would punish right small crimes, with murders, effusion of blood, and confiscation of goodes. This judgement may be geuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a revenging minder yet notwithstanding he qualified that naturall bitternes with reason geuing place to necessity. and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his fouldiers flue Albitus one of his Lieutenauntes, beating him to death with states and stones, being a man of good quality, and reuerence. Wherby men could hardly decerne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vied in punishing of them that had offended hime fometimes he hanged vp men for very small and light causes: Some other times againe to the contrary, he paciently aboade the most grieuous offences in the worlde : and lightly pardo-one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he passed ouer with silence, vsing no manner of punishment, and turned it to a boast in the end, saying, that hismen were the more obedient faultes by worthy feruice. And furthermore, he did not regarde them that did repronehing buthauinge determined with him selfe to destroy Marius, and to procure that he might

and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe bishoppe of Rome, for which mariage the come mon people fang fonges and ballades vp and downe Rome against him: and many of thems. ble men enuied him for it, thinkinge him vnworthy of so noble a Ladie, whom they though worthy to be Conful, as Titus Linius fayth. Now the was not his only wife, for he had a young wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After her he maried AElia, then a think called Calia, whom he put away bicause she brought him no children. But notwithstanding the went honorably away from him with very good wordes of her, befides many other good ly riche giftes he gaue her: howbeit thortly after he maried Metella, which made the world fuspect that Celia was put away for her naughtines . Howsoeuer it was, Sylla did euer home and love Metella: infomuch as the people of Rome afterwardes making fute, that they then were banished for Marino faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refu fed by Stilla, they cried out with open voyce for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtain their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the city of A THENS, he delt more cruelly with them, bicause that some of them had scoffed at Metella from the walles: howhere that was afterwardes. So Sylla making his reckening at that time that the Confulshippe wasa fmall matter, in comparison of that which he looked for in time to come: was maruelous de firous to go against Mithridates. iect to those passions, which neuer waxe olde, as we may dayly see by experience. For being now a heavy man, fickly of body, and broken in feruice abroade in the warres, from the which he came but newly home, and brused moreouer with age: did notwithstanding yet aspiren have the charge of the warres fo farre of beyond the feas. Wherfore, to obtaine his purpole whilest Sylla was gone a little vnto the campe to geue order for certaine thinges that weren be done, he remaining in the city, did practife this pestilent mortall sedition, which alone did more hurte vnto the city of ROME, then all the enemies that ROME ever had: the which the goddes them feliues had foreshewed by many fignes and tokens. For fire tooke of it selfe in the stanes of the ensignes, which they had much a doe to quenche. Three ranens brought the young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the fight of many people, and afterwardes caried the garbage they left of them into their neaftes. Rats also having gnawen forms iuells of golde in a church, the fextens fetting a trappe for them, a rat was taken full of young and kendled fine young rats in the trappe, of the which the ate vp three. But more yet - on a fayer bright day whe there was no clowde feene in the element at all, men heard fuch a flago found of a trompet, that they were almost all out of their wittes, for feare of so great a novie Whereuppon the wife men and foothfayers of THUSCAN being asked their opinions, tolde them: that this fo straunge and wonderfull figne did pronounce the chaunge of the worlde, and the departure out of this into an other life. For they holde opinion, that there should be eight worldes, all contrary one vnto an other, in manners and facions of life: vnto enery one of the which layd they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance. Howbeitthey all came to ende their course within the space of the revolution of the great yeare; and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there are feene fuch wonderfull ftraunge fignes on the earth, or in the element. And fuch as have studied that science, doe certained know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contrary vnto the first in their lives & maners, and which are either more or leffe acceptable vnto the goddes, then those which lived in former age. For they fay, that amongest great chaunges and alteracions which are done in those places from one age vnto an other, the science of distination, and foretelling of things to come doth grow in reputacion, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleafeth God w

Thus Maritie grew great andway familier, with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the people; who in all kindes of wic. But Sylla shortly after vpon the like advantage, vied no such manner of requitall or gratuitie towardes him, which bred a fecret misliking emongest the Senate: howebeit the common people made open shewe of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reie-Aing one Nonius his neuiew, and one Seruius, who vppon confidence of his fayor, prefented them selues to sue for certaine offices. And besides the shame of this refusall to spyte him the more, they chose others in their steedes, whose honor and preferrement they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely diffembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying, that by his meanes the people of Rome enioved a full & perfit liberty, that in fuch cases of election, they might freely do what the selues lifted. And to mitigate somwhat the peoples euill will towards him he determined to choose Lucius Cinna Consull, who was of a contrary faction to him: having first bounde him by so- Lucius Cinna lemne othe and curse to fauor his doings & whole procedings. But Sylla left him with his judges, went Sylla wim ato make warres against Mithridates. And beginning atthe city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GREECE to rebell, euen vnto Thess ALIE, E fauing that he received fome loffe by the city of CHERONEA. Where Brutius Surajone of the Lieutenauntes of Sentius gouernor of MACEDON (a man of great wisedome and valliantnes) came against him, and stayed him for goinge any further, ouerrunning the whole contry of BOETIA, like a furious raging river. And fetting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHER ONE A.O. uerthrewe him in three feuerall battells: repulfed, and inforced him to take the feaes againe. Butas Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commaundement to geue placevnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commission in that behalfe geuen him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the contry of Bono-TIA, and returned towardes his generall Sentius: notwithstandinge his affaires prospered betterthen he could have wished, and that all G REECE were very willing to renote for the repu-

But the hast that he made to returne againe to Rome, for feare of the new change which he heard of daily from thence compelled him to hazardthis warre in that forte with great daunger, many battells, and infinite charge: confideringealing that befides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thow fand mules and mulets labor ring dayly to furnishe his engines of batterie. And when some that were present told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes citherne in the temple: whether he beleued it was so in dede, or bicause he would put this superstitious search into Syllaes head he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him fent him word, that he manus

Now for the other iuells of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew not that they were fent vnto Syllebin the filter tonne, which only was that that remained of the offeringes of the kings, the A MPHI-CTYONS were faine to breake that in peces, bicause it was so great & massie, that the beattesof draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other auncient ROMAINE Captaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Faulus AEmilius: of the which, the one having driven king Antiochus out of GREECE, and the rest also having overthrowen the kings of MACEDON, they never once touched the gold and filter of the temples of GREECE The commen- but contrarily fent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honor and reverence. But as to them, they were all Captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their souldies wel trained, & obedient at commaundement, voide of rebellion, or any maner of mutiny. And taines, for or for them felues, were kings in greatnes of corage and magnanimity of minde: but in expense fouldiers, and of their persones, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but nedefull and necessary, proporalfo for their tioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then seare their enemies. Now the Captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, fought not their preferrement in the common wealth by vertue, but by force, and having greater warres one with an other, then with frame gers their enemies: were compelled to flatter their fouldiers whom they should communic and to buy their paines & feruice, feeding them still with large & great expences, to please & content them. Wherein they did not confider, that they brought their contry into bondage, & made themselves slaves of the vilest people of the world, whiles that in the meane time they fought to commained by all meanes possible those, which in many respectes were farre better then them selues. And this was the cause that both draue Marius out of Rome, & madehim also to returne againe against Sylla. This selfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octavius, and FimA brittoflay Placess: of whicheuills, Syllawas the very first and only author, spending out of all syllams first reason, and geuing the souldiers largely that served vnder him, to winne their good willes the manthal floir more and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, Sylla had nede of mountaines of motor fernice of ney, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make straungers traytors, and besides to souldiers, by furnishe and fatisfie his owned iffolute fouldiers. For he had such an earnest defire to take the boute and city of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be diffwaded from it. And either it was of a certen fufferance. vaine ambition he had to fight against the auncient reputation of that city, being then but a thadow to that it had bene : or els of a very anger, for the mockes & gibes which the toran A. rillion gaue in his speches from the wals, against him & Metella, to spite him the more withall. This tyran Ariftion was full of all cruelty & wickednes, having taken up all the worst qualities B and greatest impersections of king Mithridates, & heaped them wholly together in him selfe: The wicked-

by reason whereof the poore city of A THENS which had escaped from so many warres, tyran-reas Aristion, nies, & ciuill diffentios vntil that prefent time, was by him, as by an vncurable difeafe, brought witto all extreamity. For a bushell of wheate was worth a thowland Drachmas, and men were

And when the Nunne of the fame teple fent vnto him for a quarter of a bushel of wheate. he sent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellers of the city, the priestes &religious came to the castell, holding op their hands, & befeeching him to take some pity of the city & fall to copolition with Sylla: he made the to be driven away, & scattered with flings. In the end very late, & yet with great a do, he fent two or three of his quaffing copanions vnto sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demaund of composition for the towne-but began to praise & magnifie the dedes of Thefeus, of Eumolpus, & of the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made them this aunswere. My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rethoricke: for the Romaines sent me not hither to learne nor to study, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meane time there were there taine fpyes in the city that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyran bicause he kept no better watch on that side of the wal that was directly ouer against thewalls. Those spies went straight vnto Sylla, & told him what they had heard the old me say. Syllatracted no time, but came to the place in the night to fee it. & perceiving that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And him selfe wrytes in his commentaries, that the first mathat scaled the walls, was Marcus Teius: who finding a souldier ready to resist him, gaue him fuch a fore blow with his fword vpon his head peece, that his fword brake in two, and yet notwithstanding that he saw him selfe naked & difformed of a sword, did not for all that give back, Teins. but floode still to it, & kept the place so long, till through him the city was take, & all apon the talkeof these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe between the hauf of Piraa, by Sylla &the holy haue: & having before made the breach very plaine, entred into the city about mid-

For he had geuen them the towne in spoyle, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ran through the streetes with their swords drawen, making an vncredible slaughrer: to that to this daye they be not acknowen, nor doe not declare what nomber of persons were finde no mercy, no moderacion of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partely at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Syllaes feete view their knees: and partely also at the requests of the Romaine Senators that were in his campe who prayed him to pardon the body of the city, and the rather for that he had already ourse ched the thirst of his rauening mind sufficiently well, after that he had somwhat sayd in praise of the auncient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to geue the greater number vnto the smaller, and the living to the dead. Sylla wryteth him selfe in his commentaries, that he took the city of ATHENS on the very felfe day of the calendes of march, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chaunce ma ny thinges are done at ATHENS in memory of Noes flood, and of the vniuerfall destructions the whole world that was in olde time by rage of waters, falling out even in that very moneth When the city was thus taken, the tyran Aristion fled into the castell, where he was befreged by Curio, whome Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last, constrained thereunto for lacke of water, yelded. The castell was no some general, but immediatly by goddes providence, the weather miraculously altered. Shortly after also, Solle Pirea wome. having gotten the haven of Piræa, burnt the greatest parte of the buildinges: amongestothers was the arfenall and armory, which Philo in old time had caused to be built, being of a ftraunge and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenaunts of kine of Mithridates, comming from THRACIA and MACEDON, with a hundred thowfand footement tenne thow fand horsemen, and foure score and tenne thow sand carts of warre all armed with fythes: fent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at ancker in the hauen of Munychia. and not willing to leave the fea, nor come to fight with the ROMAINES, but feeking ratherto draw these warres out in length, and to cut of all vittells from his enemies. Sylla vinderstanding this drift better then him felfe, departed out of the contry of A TTICA(a very barren foyle, and in deede not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into Bob otia: wherein most men thought he committed great error, to leave ATTICA, which is a very hard contry for horse men, and to go into Borot 1A, a plaine champion: and fo much the rather, bicaufe he knew well enough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen, the Barbaria, and their armed cartes with fythes. But to auoyd famine, and lacke of vittells as we have fave he was compelled to feeke battell. Furthermore, he had an other cause also that made him in their easts afrayed, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensius, a famous Captaine, and very valliantalfo, who brought him aide out of THES SALTE, and the barbarous people lay in waitefor The fraight of him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Syllatake his way into BOEOTIA. But in the meane time, Caphie that was our contry man, deceiving the barbarous people, guided Hortensius an other way by mount Parnassus, and brought him wader the city of TITHORA, which was not then so great a city as nowe at this present it is, but was a castell only, scituated upon the point of a rocke, hewen all about: whether the Phoce-Ansin olde time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retyred them felues for their fafety. Hortensius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his enemies, so long as day light lafted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard frong wayes, vnto the city of PATRONIDE, where he joyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. tenfits mer at Thus being joyned together, they camped vpon a hill that standeth about the middest of the plaine of Elatea: the foyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of trees, and water at the foote of the same. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature & scituacion where of, Sylla doth maruelously commend. When they were camped, they seemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more were they in deede, for they had not about fifteen army together hundred horse, and lesse then sisteen thowsand sootemen. Whereupon the other Captains their enemies, against Archelaus minde, brought out their bandes into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horsemen, with cartes, with shieldes and targettes, so that the ayer was even cut a funder as it were with the violence of the noyle & cries of some

Other thinke, that the cow which was geuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in the place: which hath euer fince kept the name, for that the PHENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neere vnto CHERONEA, the Colonell Gabinius whome he had fent thinker with a garrison to defend the same, went to meete him with his men very well armed, wearing a lawrell garland: and Sylla after he had faluted him, and his fouldiers, made an oration vnio enterprise and he him selfe in the meane season went and set his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horsemen on the winges, placed him selfe in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Murana. Galba & Hortensius his Lieutenauntes, were placed in the tayle with certaine bandes of the reregard which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemis the mountaine, which did so feare the barbarous people, that they began immediatly to flic, one of them for the most parte killing an other . There was no relistaunce, but flying downe the mountaine, fell apon the pointes of their owne partifans and pykes, and one of them thus fting in an others necke, tombled hedlong downe the mountaine together, having their ene mies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behinde where they lay open vnto them: fo as they were flaine a three thowfande of them about this mount taine Thurium, And as for them that fought to faue them felues by flight, Murana that was already fet in battell ray, met with fome, cut them of by the way, and flue them downe right; The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrufting into the battell of their footemen, put the most parte of them quite out of order, & maruelously troubled

A their Captaines before they could fet them againe in order : which was one of the chiefest causes of their ouerthrowe. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vppon them in this trouble and diforder, and had quickely wonne the ground that was between both armies, wherby he tooke awaythe force of all their armed cartes with fythes, which are then of greatest force, when The force of they have the longest course, to geve them a swift and violent stroke in their chase: whereas the armed when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker, and of lesse strength, euen as Sythes confish arrowes are, that a farre of enter not deepe into the thing they be shot at : as at that time it fell miong courfe out with the barbarous people. For their first cartes set foorth so faintly, and came on with so feeble a force, that the ROMAINES fent them backe, & eafily repulsed them, with great slaughter and clapping of handes one to an other, as they commonly vie in the ordinarie games of

B horserunning at ROME. When they had thus repulsed the cartes, the battell of Syllaes soote Syllaes conmen beganne to charge the barbarous people, who basing their pykes, stoode close one to an stiff with Arother bicause they would not be taken : & the ROMAINES on thother side bestowed first their Thorisms. darres among them, and then fodginly drewe out their fwordes in the heate they were in, and mirafide the enemies pykes, whereby they might come neerer to their bodies. There were fifteene thow fand flaues in the fronte of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieurenaunt had made free by open proclamation, and had deuided them by bandes a. States made mongest the other footemen. By occasion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion, spake free by author pleasauntly at that time, saying, that he neuer saw slaues before haue liberty to speake and do Lieutenaunt like free men, but only at Saturnes feaftes. Neuertheleffe, they against the nature of flaues, were in the fielde. Very valliant to abide the (hocke, and the ROMAINE footemen could not fo readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them geue backe, bicaufe they stoode very close one to an other. and their ranckes were of fuch a length befides: vntill fuch time as the ROMAINES that were behinde the first ranckes, did so pelt them with their slinges, hurling stones, bestowing their dartes & arrowes apon them, that in thend they compelled them all to turne their backes, and flie a maine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his army, supposing to enclose the ROMAINES behinde: Hortensius straight wayes caused the bands he had with him torun & charge vpon the flanckes. Which Archelaus perceiving, made the horsemen he had about him turne their faces forthwith, which were in nuber aboue two thowsand : infomuch as Hortensius, being fet apon with all his trowpe, was compelled to retyre by litle and litle to-

ring by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Horsensine there, and with speede returned against towardes the right wing of his enemies from whence Sylla was gone. hoping he had left it vnfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to comaund them, Taxilles on thother fide, caused his copper targets also to march against Murana: so as the noyse they made on both fides, caused the mountaines to ring againe, wherewithall Sylla stayed, standing in Hout which way to take. At the last he resolued, to returne to the place fro whence he came, & sent Hortensius with foure ensignes to aide Murana: and him selfe with the fift in great speede, went E towardes the right wing of his army, the which was now already bickering, and joyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Syllawas comen with his aide, they did easily diffresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them flying for life to the river, & vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithstanding forgate not Murana, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that he on his fide syllar vittohad also put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chase of them that fled. There was a nof Muhrimaruelous flaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them supposing

These markes of triumphe were let up for the battell which he wanne into plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the river of Molus; he fet vp an other also in the toppe of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were vpon behinde : and there is wrytten in Greeke letters, that the valliant deedes of Omological and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victorie. Sylla for the ioy of this great women battell, caused musitians to play in the city of THEBES, where he builded a stage for all the musitians, neere vnto the sountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GREHCIANS were appoin ted judges of that musicke, whom he caused to be sent for out of other cities, bicause heme. tally hated the THEBANS: infomuch as he tooke from them halfe their landes, which hecon

Sylla after this having intelligence that Flaceus, one of his enemies, was cholen Confull at ROME, and had paffed the fea Ionium with an army, under pretext to make ware against king Mithridates, but in deede to make warre with him selfe: tooke his iorney towark THESSALIE to meete him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newers him out of all partes, that there was a new and second army of the kings arrived, no lesse then the first, the which spoyled and destroyed all the contry which he had left behinde him. For Dorylaudi. Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenauntes, was arrived in the city of CHALCIDE with great fleete of thippes, having brought thither with him foure score thowsand fighting men

fwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in enery place, that so many thowsandesof fouldiers coulde not have bene cast away in the first battell, without some notable treason Wherupon Sylla returned with all possible speede, & made Dorylaus know before many days paffed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wife man, and knew well enough the worthines and valliant corage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus having had but a litle proofe only in certains light skirmishes which he made against Sylla, about TILPHOSS ION in THESSALIE: him felle was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazarde battell, but rather to drawout the warres in length, and supplant the ROMAINES with charge & expence. And yet not with ftading, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth all about ORCHOMENE, wherether were encamped, gaue great encoragement to Archelaus, who judged it a very fit place to gene battell in, specially bicause he was the stronger of horsemen in the field. For of all the plains that are within the contry of BOEOTIA, the greatest & largest of them, is the plaine nere to the city of ORCHOMENE: which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the marisses, where the river of Melas disperseth it selfe abroade. The head of the same river is not farre from the city of ORCHOMENE, & that river only of all other rivers in GREECE from the The river of very head whence it commeth, is nauigable; and hath befides an other fingular property that nature therof. it riseth & swelleth euen in the longest sommer dayes, as the river of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the felfe same plantes and trees, saving that they beare no frute, neither are they so great as those of Agypt. This river hath no longe course, bicause that the most parte of the water runneth into lakes and marisses, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litte parte of it that falleth into the river of Cephifus, in the place where the redes grow that they make good flutes withal. When they were camped one nere to an other, Archelaus lay quieth and sturred not. But Sylla presently cast great trenches from one side to an other, to stoppe the way against their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, and haue driven the Romainis into the marifles. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, fo foone as their Captaines had genen them liberty, discharged with such a sury, that they did not only scatter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the most parte of their gard also that stoode in battell F ray to defend them, in a maruelous feare, who also beganne to flie. Which Sylla perceining lighted straight from his horse, and taking an ensigne in his hande, ran through the middestel Syllabeing offended herewith, angerly aunswered thems gaine. Then Mithidates, as ye fay, meaneth to kepe P APHL MG ON IA ftill, and refuseth to gene the (hippes I demaunded : where blooked that he would have humbly thanked me on this knees, if Lleft him his right hand only, with the which he put so many Romaine citizens death. But I hope to make him tell me an other tale, if I come once into A sia : but nower PERGAMUM, he speaketh his pleasure of this warre which he hath not seene. The Ambastic dors being afrayed of his wordes, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and his fought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hande. By intrested in thend he obtained of Sylla to fende him vnto Mithridates : promiting that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles & condicions of peace that he demaunded or if he could not he would kill him felfe with his owne handes. Vipon this promise Sylla sent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the contrie of MEDICA: and after he hadde Atroved the most parte thereof, returned backe againe into MACHDON, where Archelauth ing returned from Michridates, founde him neere vnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all should be well, howebeit that his master cattheidates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now, the matter that made Mithridates so earnest to speake with Sylla, was chiefely for Fimbria: who having Haine Flace in the Confull, being of the contratt! faction vnto Sylle, and certaine of Mishriddes Lieutenauntes also, wenchim felfeagainst him to fight with him . Mithridates feating his commine, chose rather to make him felfe solution frend. So Mithridates and Sylle met together in the contry of TROADE, in the city of Die at lea, with twenty thowland footenich, fixed thowlande horse, and a number of armed cares with lythes belides by land, Sylla having onely but four enfignes of footemen; and two have dred horsemen. Matheridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand : Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the peace with the condicions which Archelaus had agreed with Mithridates made him no auniwated Sylla following on his tale; fayd ynco him. It is for fold

A also yppon the ROMANES them selves. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long rime that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, seeing Syllats aunthat he lacked no comely words, to cloke his fowle and tham efull dedes: but with all he tharp- four to Mishyreproued him, and draue him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwardes asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made aunfwer that he did. Then Sylla faluted, embraced, and kiffed him : and calling for the kinges Nicomedes, and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their frende a- Nicomedes gaine. In conclusion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three score and tenne gallies, and king of Birbyfrie hundred bow men, he returned by fea into his realme of Pontvs. But Sylla hearing that Ariobarcanes

in one selfe day caused a hundred and fifty thowsand ROMANE citizens to beslaine, that were Ahundred & dispersed abroade in divers places of Asia) so to departe, and go his way safe, with the riches fifty thousand and spoyles of the contry, which he had bereft them of, and vied at his pleasure, the space of Claime in one forty yeares together: aunswered them in excuse of him selfe, that he was not able to make day in Afra warres with Mithridates, & Fimbria both, if once they were joyned together against him. And dates comlo Sylls departing thence, went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neere to the city of maundement, THYATIRA, and lodged him felfe as neere vnto him as he conveniently might. Nowe whilest Fimbria camhewas compassing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes fouldiers came out of their campe ina. in their coates without any armor or weapon, to falute Syllaes fouldiers, and holpe them very frendly to make up their trenche. Which Fimbria feeing, and perceiving his fouldiers mindes sochaunged, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose handes he looked for no mercy: killed him felfe in his owne campe. fisher men were so amazed with his wordes, that they stoode still, and could not tell what is fav. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, & bad them go their wayes a gods name, and be not affravel for they brought no small intercessors with them, which were worth the reckening of When Sylla had genen them these wordes, the ALLEIANS went home with a mery harte, to gather them selves together againe in their city. Sylla so passing through THESSALIA & MACEDON came to thesea side, intending to go from the city of DYRRACHIV M VNTO BRVNDVSIVM, with twelve hundred fayle. The city of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIVM, and thereabour is a parke confecrated vnto the nymphes, where in a fayer goodly greene meadowe in many Bubbles of fire places there commethout great bubles of fire that flame continually: and it is fayd that there was a Satyre taken fleeping, euen in the very felfe fame forme the painters and image granes hauefet him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all fortes of interpreters what h A Supressite he was, he made no aunswere that a man could vnderstand: but only put forth a sharpe voyce like the neving of a horse, or whynnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbaked his men to passe the sea, he was asrayed that so soone as they were landed in ITALIE, they would (hrinke from him, and euery man go home to his owne. But they sware and promise first of them selves that they would tary and keepe together, and by their willes would doe to hurt in IT ALIE. Moreover, perceiving that he stoode in neede of money, they offred him of theirs, & euery man to lend him as his ability ferued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their goodwill: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valliant fouldiers, he wenta. sainfifiene gainft fifteene generalls of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fifty enfignesoff footemen well armed, as he him felfe wryteth in his commentaries. But the goddes promifed and fifite en. him good fortune in his warres, by many fundry apparant fignes. For in a facrifice he made by TARENT V M, after he was come a lande, the liver of a certaine beaftfacrificed, was altoge ther facioned after the maner of a crowne or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang two bandes or rolles. And a little before he went into CAMPANIA, neere vnto the mountaine E. pheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuerthelesse was no matter of trueth, but a vision onely that anpeared, and rifing from the earth dispersed it selfe by little and little here and there in the aver. and in thende vanished quite away, as clowdes which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the felfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two greater-1 mies against him, were ouerthrowen by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had appointed any man his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely vpon the corace and life of his fouldiers, whose goodwill to serue against them was such, as following this victory, he compelled the Confull Norbanus after he had flaine fixe thowfande of his men, w take the city of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exployte, (as him felfereported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he savth furthermore, that in the city of S YL V I V M, there was a flaue of one Pontius a citizen, who beinge inspired with a propheticall spirite, came to tell him from the goddesse Bellona, thathe should grow in strength, & cary away the victory of these wars: how beit that if he did not her him the fooner, the Capitoll at ROME should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his wordes, being the fixteene day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now July. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neere vnto the city of Fidentia with fixteene enfignes only, against fifty enfignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, bicause the most parte of them were naked & vnarmed, was afrayed to hazard the battel and as he was even bethinking him felfe what was best to determine the A winde that of, there rose a little winde out of a goodly meadow that blewe a wonderfull sorte of flowers 2pon the fouldiers on every parte of them. These flowers stayed of them selves as they fell, fome apon their targets, and others apon their moryans, without falling to the grounde:10 that it seemed to their enemies a farre of, as if they had bene garlandes of flowers vpon that F heades. This made Lucullus fouldiers more lufty a great deale, then they were before, and with this good will they determined to geue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew,

A flue eighteene thow fand of them in the field, & tooke their campe. This Lucullus was brother Lucullus vi voto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates, & Tigranes. Neuertheles, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puisant armies, thought good to vie policy with force: & therefore practifed with Scipio, one of the Confulls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: & thereupon were oft meetings & affemblies of both fides. Now Sylla draue of the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still feeking occasion of delay, to thend that his fouldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft and syllaes policie fubrilty as well as him felfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes fouldiers by repayre inrohis campe: for they comming into Serpices campe, being very conversaunt with the, straight corrupted some of them with ready money, other with promises, & other with faver flattering B words, & many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practife had continued a while Sylla comming nere vnto Scipioes campe with twenty enfignes only : all his men faluted Scipioes fouldiers, & they refalluting them againe, yelded them selves vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was Sylla wanne leftposte alone in his tente where he was taken, but they afterwards let him goe. So Sylla with 40 enfignes his twenty enfignes, like vnto the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birds into their netts, policie. having gotten forty enfignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo tayd of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe & a lyon both: Carbou fay. his campe. I field it was that Carbo rayd of Syda, that the had a light with a lower any of Syda, but that the foxed dd him more hurte & mischiefe, then the lyon. And furthermore, there fell a maruelous great shower of raine vpon them as they were busie, opening the way, that troubled them more, then the labor they had in hande. Whereuppon the private Captaines of the bandes went to make Sylla vnderstande it, and to pray him to deserre the battell vntill an other day: showing him howe D thefouldiers wearied with labor, lay downe vpon their targettes on the grounde to take their eale. Sulla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly in deede against his will. But when he had geuen the fignall to lodge, and that they beganne to trenche and fortifie their campe: Marius the younger commeth a horse backe marching brauely before all his companie, hoping to haue furprifed his enemies in diforder, and by that meanes to haue ouerthrowen them eafily. But farre otherwise did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sallahad in his forefayed dreame: for his men fallinge in a rage withall, left their worke in the trenche where they wrought, stucke their dartes uppon the bancke, ranne uppon their enemies with their fwordes drawen, and with a maruelous crie fet apon them fo valliantly, that they were notable to refift their furie, but fodainly turned their backes and fled, where there was a great E and notable flaughter made of them. SYLLA 120 SAMNYTE, who comming like a fresh champion to set apon him, when he was already, med a ried, and had fought many battells, had almost slaine him even at Rome gates. For Thele nus havinge gathered together a great number of fouldiers with one Lamponius Lycanian marched with all speede towards the city of PR ENESTES to deliuer Marius the younger the was befieged there. But vnderstandinge that Sylla on the one fide, came in great haste alsom meete him, and that Pomponius came behinde him on the other fide, & perceiuing, moreous that the way was fo thut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backeward being a vallian fouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fieldes, most daungerously ventured to go straight to Rome. And so stale away by night with all his whole power, and marchine to Rome ward, had almost taken it at his first comming for that there was neither watchner ward kept: but he stayed happely tenne furlonges from the gate Collina, bragging with him. felfe, and beleuing that he should doe wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Can. taines. The next morning betimes came diverse young noble men and gentlemen out of the citie to skirmithe with Thelesinus: who flue a great number of them, and among others one Appine Claudius a young gentleman of a noble house, and very honest. Whereuppon (asyon may eafily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and specially the women, who fell a shreeking and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But for all that, Sylla draue them backe, and commaunded his tronpets to founde the alarome, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was tharper and more cruell, then any other that ever he fought before. The right wing where Crassius was, had the better much: but the left wing was very fore distressed, & stoode in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vppon a white courser that was both swift, and very strong. This was enough to shew the simplest Romane in Rome, that they had but only chaunged the tyran, but not the tyranny. Now for Marins, that had bene ever of a churlift & seuere nature euen from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harde his natural stubbornes. The passion of his anger was sove by his onne hement against him, that by the extreame straining of him selfe, he brake the impostument his body, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of blood by reason whereof his strength him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other frendes: yet he made fome for love, fome by intreaty, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corpsinto Rome, gaue both safety and honor vnto the performance of his funeralls. And it is saydal fo, that the ROMANE Ladies, amongest other things, bestowed such a quantity of persumes odoriferous matter towardes the fame: that befides those which were brought in two hundred and tenne great baskets, they made a great image to the likenes of Syllahim felfe, and at other of a fergeaunt carying the axes before him, all of excellent incence & fynamon, When the day of the funeralls came, fearing least it would raine in the forenone, all the elemented was called Polthumia, bicause the Romanes call those children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consultant due to let that his body should not be honorably buried, as they were accustomed to bury no ble men & men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, bicause he had getten melo clowdy: they deferred to cary forth the body to be burnt, untill past three of the clocke inthe afternone. And then rose there such a sodaine boysterous winde, that it set all the stake ofwodde straight afire, that the body was burnt at a tryce, and the fire going out, fell a great hower of raine that held on till night: fo that it feemed good fortune following him even to his ende, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the fielde of Mars, and they fay that he him selfe made his owne epitaphe that is wrytten voon it, which syllaes epiwas that no man did euer passe him, neither in doing good to his frendes, nor in doing mis- taphe. chiefe to his enemies.

Ow that we have at large also set forth the life of the Romane, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both a like, that both of them grew to be great men, rifing of the felues through their owne vertue: but this only is proper to Lylander, that all the offices & dignities which he attained vnto in the common wealth, were layed apon him through the peoples good wills and confents. For he compelled them to nothinge, neither viurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vppon them, contrarie to lawe: for, as the common faying

Asatthat time in Rome, the people being corrupted, and the state of government ytterly subuerted and brought to nought: to day there rose vp one tyranne, to morow an other, And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vsurped and ruled all, when such fellowes as Glancia and Saturninus, did both banish and drive out of Rome fuch men as Metellus was: and where also in open affembly they flue Confuls formes in the market place, and where force of armes was bought & fold for gold and filuer, with the which the fouldiers were corrupted & where they made new lawes with fire and fword, and forced men to obey the fame. Yet I peake not this in reproache of him that in such troublesome times founde meanes to make him selfe the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity he great years in so vn- The chiefe fortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. LYSANDER & SYLLA. 526 times: for the honor of his vertue did alwayes remaine, and made him inftly accompanded the worthiest man. Where the other being once only chosen generall of an army, remaind tenne yeares continually in warres and hostilitie, making him selfe by force, sometime Can full, fomtime vice Confull, and fomtime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyranne, Indeb Lylander attempted to chaunge, and alter the flate of gouernment in his contrie, howbein was with greater lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he fought it by reason, and good perswasion, not by the sword:neither would he make a chaunge of the whole at one selferime as Sylla did, but fought only to reforme the election of kinges. The which thing according to nature, doubtlesse seemed very just: that he which was the best amongest good men, should be chosen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all GREECE, not for her nobility, but for her vertue only. For like as a good hunter doth not feeke for the whelpe of a good dogge, h but for the good dogge him felfe: nor a wife man of armes also, the colte that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse him selfe. Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a civil gouernment, committeth a fowle fault: if he looke of whom his Prince (hould be borne, and not what the Prince him felfe should be, considering that the LACED EMONIANS them felias haue depriued diuerse of their kinges from their crowne and realme, bicause they were not Princely, but ynprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet isi alwayes ill of it felfe: but vertue is honored for her felfe alone, and not bicause she isplaced with nobility. Now for the wronges and injuries they both committed, the one did workeon raine, that Lylander did great wronges to gratifie his familliars : and the most parte of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannicall power of certaine his frendes. Where

Sylla fought for spite to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admirality from Dolobelle which he him felfe had geuen, & caused Lucretius Offella to be slaine openly in his owne fight bicause he sought to be Consull, for recompence of the good service he had done: for which cruelty of his, causinge his ownessrendes to beslaine in such forte, he made every man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiors touching couetouines and pleasure doth thew that the intent of the one was the defire of a good Prince, and the other, that of a tyranne. For we doe not finde that Lylander, for all his great Princely authority, did euer vie any infolency or lafei-

And when any other had out bidden his price, & that the crief had cried it out allowed; then was he angry, and fayd: My frendes, I have great wrong done me here, not to fuffer me fell the spoils Syllaes pren- I have gotten at mine owne pleasure, and dispose it as I list my selfe. Where Lysander commarily sent to the common wealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very presentes that were geuen to him selfe. And yet I do not commende him in that deede. For, peraduenture he did more hurt to Sparta, bringing thither that gold & filuer: then Sylladid to Rome, in washing and confuming that he confumed. Howbeit I alleage this onely, for proofe and declaration that Lylander was nothing couctous. They both have done that vnto their citie, which here I any other but them felues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citzens notwithstanding to good order and gouernment : and Lyfander contrarily filled his cine

A with vice, yet not infected withall him felfe. Thus were they both offendors, the one for breaking the law he commaunded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was him felfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to defire those thinges, which he aboue all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and civil government. Now for matters of warre and battells fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, Sylla for wars neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Ly/ander wanne only burtwo bat- 10 be prefertells by fea, befides the taking of the citie of ATHENS: which (shough I graunt him) being to lander. rightly confidered, was no great exployte of warre, how beit it was a noble act, confidering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in Bon or Inhard bythe citie of ALIARTE: a man might say peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he stayed not for king Paufanias aide (the which came from PLA-THES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and bicause he went in a geere infury; and in a vaine ambition to runne his head against a wall: fo that men of all fortes making a desperate salve out of ALIARTE vpon him, flue him there to no purpose. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that died athebattell of Levernes, relifting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Enaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to genethem affured victory, receiued his deadly wounde: for all these men dyed like noble kings, & valliant Captaines. Where Islander rashly cast him selfe away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the auncient SPARTANS did like wife men, to auoyde the fight with walles. For the noblest and valliantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not onely by the first fouldier that commeth, but by every seely woman or childe. As they say that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrarie againe. the victories that Sylla wanne in set battells, and the thowsandes of enemies which he slue are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he tooke the city of Rome twise, and the hauen of ATHENS: not by famine as Lylander did, but by force, after he had by many great battells driven Archelaus out of firme land, into the maine fea. It is to be confidered also, against what Captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a pastime, as a ma might say, for Lylander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to surprise and deceiue Philocles, a common orator at AT HENS, Much vvorse then tvvo edged svvord, his busie tongue did seeme: Which prailed still, and honestie did neuer once esteeme,

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouche fafe to compare with his horfekeeper, nor Marius with one of his sergeauntes or masebearers. But to leaue a side the particular names of all other Princes, Lordes, Confulls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernors that made warres with Sylla: what ROMANE Captainewas there more to be feared, then Marius? Sylla fought made warres with sylla: what it of Man & Captaine was there in ore to be leaved, then a sub-min min of what king living was there of fuch power as king Mithridates? And of Generalls and Lieutegreatest power nauntes of armies in all ITALIE, were there any euer more valliant, then Lamponius and The- and our came lesimus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and flue the them. two last? But the greatest matter of all that we have spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Ly-

bouethe rest, he would not vouchesafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hande sallate maonely, before he had spoken it with his owne mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would gnanimity. forgoe Asia, deliuer him his gallies, and geue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPAD O-F CIA vnto their naturall kinges. This me thinkes was the goodliest act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to have preferred the benefit of the common wealth in that forte, before his private comodity. For therin he was like vnto a good greyhoudthat first fander did all his noble actes, with the aide of his whole contrie: where Sylla to the contrarie E did his, (being banished from his contry) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time that they draue Syllaes wife out of Rome, that they ouerthrewe his houses, and slue his frendes also in Rome: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thowsandes of fighting men in Boe o TIA, and ventred his person in manifold daungers, so that in the end he conquered them all to the honor & benefit of his contry. Furthermore, Sylla would never stoude to king Mithridates, for any particular allyance he offred him, neither yeelde vnto him for any 528 pincheth the deare, and holdeth him fast, till he have overthrowen him: and then afterwarden followeth the recouery of his owne private quarrell. And lastly, me thinkes it is easily indeed what difference there was between their two natures, in that they did both towardes the cite of ATHENS. For Sylla having taken it, after the citizens had made fierce warres with himfor the increase of king Mithridates greatnes : yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lisander to the contrary, seing such a mighty state and Empire as that, oue. throwen from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the libertie of the pular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and established there very cruelland wicked tyrans. And therfore in myne opinion, we shall not much swarue from troth, if we geue this judgement: that Sylla did the greater acts: and Lyfander committed the Sylla and Lyfewer faultes. And that we geue to the one the honor of a continent and modest man and to the other the commendacion of a valliant and skilfull fouldier.

THE LIFE OF

Eripoltas the Soothfayer, he that brought king Opheltas out of Tubs SALIE into the contry of BOEOTIA, with the people which werever dre his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time florishedin that contry, the more parte of the which were ever refident in theci-Yof CHERONEA, bicause it was the first city that was coquered from the barbarous people whom they expulsed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great corage, and naturally geuen to the warres: who were so forward and aduenturous in all damgers theros(in the inuasions of the Medes into Greece & in the battells of the GAVLES) that they were flaine all of them, but onely Damon (a little childe left fatherleffe and motherleffe) furnamed Peripole as that escaped, who for goodly personage and

The memers noble corage excelled all the lufty youthes of his time, though otherwise he was very rude, F estend parter and of a feuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growen of full age, a Romans Captaine of an enfigne of footemen (lying in garrifon for the winter feafon in the citied

A CHERONE'A) fell in great loue with Damon: and bicause he could not reape the frutes of his whonest loue by no intreaty nor giftes, there appeared vehement presumptions that by force hawentabout to abuse him, for that CHERONEA at that time (being my naturall city where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon misrulling the Captaines villanie, and detesting his abhominable desire watched him a shrewd miniciand got certaine of his companions (not many in number, bicause he might the more ferrelly compasse his enterprise) to be a counsel with him, and take his parte against the Capsine. Now there were a fixteene of them in confort together, that one night blacked their Gresall with foote, & the next morning after they had dronke together, by the breake of day

Reppon this ROMANE Captaine, that was making facrifice in the market place, and flue him with a good number of his men : and when they had done, fled out of the citie, which was fraight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereuppon they called a counsell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to fuffer paines of death: hoping thereby to have cleared their innocencie for the fact done to the ROMAINES. But the felfe famenight; as all the magistrates and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne house according to their custome: Damon & his followers stale vpon them sodainly, flue them all & fled againe vpon it. It chaunsed about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being sent on some iorney, passed by the city of CHERONEA with his army: & bicause this murther was but newwione, he stayed there a few dayes to examine the troth & originall thereof. And found that Luchu Luculdiecommons of the citie were in no fault, but that they them selues also had received hurte: lus examined

In the meane time, Damon destroyed all the contry thereabout, and still houeredneere to the citie, infomuch as the inhabitantes of the same were driven in the end to send with him, and by gentle wordes and fauorable decrees handled him to, that they intyfed him recome againe into the city: and when they had him amongest them, they chose him Gymnifiarchus, to fay, a mafter of exercises of youth. But thortly after, as they were rubbing of him

ped the daunger by testimonie of Lucius Lucullus, to honor him withall, they set vp his image

Now they that were discended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the contrie of Phocinas, neere vnto our selues thankefull for his benefit, and we thinke, that he himselfe would mislike for remail of his true testimonie, to be requited with a fauorable lye told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a passinge faver sace drawen, and liuely counterseated, and that hath an excel A press fimi- lent good grace withall, yet some manner of bleamishe or imperfection in it : we will note lowe the drawer to leave it out altogether, nor yet too curiously to shewe it, bicause them would deforme the counterfeate, and the other make it very villikely. Euen fo, bicauseitis. hard thing (or to fay better, peraduenture impossible) to describe a man, whose life shouldal together be innocent, and perfect: we must first study to wryte his vertues at large, and there by seeke perfectly to represent the troth, even as the life it selfe. But where by chauce we find certaine faultes and errors in their doinges, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by ceffity of the time or state of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperseding of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednes proceeding of vice.

certaine malice. Which we shall not neede too curiously to expresse in our history, but rathe to passe them lightly ouer, of reuerent shame to the meere frayelty of mans nature, whiches not bringe foorth a man of fuch vertue and perfection, but there is euer fome imperfection in him. And therefore, confidering with my felfe vnto whome I might compare Luculum Cimon, & Lu- thought it best to compare him with Cimon, bicause they have bene both valliant souldiers. gainst their enemies, having both done notable exploytes in warres against the barbaron people: and moreouer, they have both bene curteous & mercifull vnto their citizens, & wee both the only men that pacified the civill warres and diffention in their contrie, and both the one & the other of them wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was never GREECIAN Captaine before Cimon, nor Romane Captaine before Lucullus, that had made

warres so farre of from their contrie leaving a parte the deedes of Bacchus and of Hercula, and the deedes also of Persew, against the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANA and the deedes of Iason also: if there remaine any monument extantiince their time, worthis of credit in these our dayes. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that the neuer ended their warres, they only ouerthrewe their enemies, but neuer ouercame them together. Againe, they may note in them a great refemblaunce of nature, for their honelie curtefie and humanitie, which they shewed vnto straungers in their contrie: and for themgnificence and sumptuousnes of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we doe leave our forme other similitudes between them : howbeit in the discourse of their lives they will cally appeare. the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde wrytten in certaine poeticall verses which Melanthia and Archelaus haue wrytten of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the historiographer him felle. who was of kinne also vnto Cimon, was called in like manner Olorus, showing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his auncesters, and did also possessed mines of gold in the contry of THRACIA. It is fayd moreover that he dyed in a certaine place called the ditchie forrest, where he was slaine: howbeit that his ashes and bones were caried into the contrie of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongest the tombes of them of the house and family of Cimon, neere vnto the tombe of Cimons owne fifter called Elainick. Now, Cimon in his first young yeares had a very ill name and reporte in the city, being counted a riotous young man, & a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimons facions vp and downe, as he had also his name: fauing that his grandfather for his beaftlines was furnamed Coalemos, as much to fay as foole. Stefimbratu THAS IAN, who was about Cimons time, wryteth, that Cimon neuer learned musike, nor anyother of the liberall sciences accustomably taught to young noble mens sonnes of GREECE, & that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper vnto children borne in the contry of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diffirm F lacion, so that he rather lived PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. Panatius the Philosopher is of obi-

But furthermore, Cimons nature and condicions deferuidereat commendacion. For his vallfantnesse he gaue no place vnto Miltiades, and for The project the wifedome and judgement, the was not inferior vnto Themiftoeles : and it is out of all doubt Cimons condithat he was a juster and honefter man, then either of them both . For he was equal with the befor either of both iff the discipline of warres, and for the valliantnesse of a noble Captaine: and he did much excell them both in the properties of a good governor, and in thadministracion of the affayres of a citte, when he was but a younge man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the comminge in of the MEDES counfelled the PROJECT ATTACKS to goe out of the citie, to leave their landes and contrie, and to flibbe E diliogallies; and fight with the barbarous people by fea in the straight of SALAMINA: as e-The high was wonderinge at his bolde and venturous counfell, Cimon was the first man that went with a life and jolkie through the herecte Ceramious, vnto the castell, accompa-Hedwall his volinge familiars and companions, caryinge a bitte of a bridle in his hande to collectate with the goddeffe drifteria, fignifyinge thereby, that the citie had no neede of floilenten at that time; but of inarmers and leastnen. And after he had genen up his offer File, The tookelone of the targettes that honge uppon the wall of the temple, and havinge Made his prayer vino Mineria, came downers the hauen, and was the first that made the most parte of the citizens to take a good harte to them, and coragiously to leave the land, and the the fea. Belides all this, he was a man of algoodly starure, as son the Poet restifieth, and cimon perhad fayer curled heare and thickel and fought fo valliantlie at the day of the battell, that he forage comwaine Immedially great reputations, with the lone and good will of enerie man. King Panfa- ny infolent partes by reason of the great authority he had, & through his foolish pride where of he was full: Cimon farre otherwise, gently entertained them whom Pausanias injured, and and pride, left was willing to heare them. So that by this his curreous manner, the LACED, EMQRIANS ha uing no eye to his doinges, he stale away the rule and commaundement of all GREECE from them, & brought the ATHENIANS to be fole Lordes of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his sweete tongue, and gracious manner of ving all men. For the most parte, of the contesters of being no lenger able to away with Paulanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and submitted them selves under the protection of Cimon and Aristides , who did not only receive them but wrote also to the counfell of the Ephores at LACED EMON, that they should call Paul and home, for that he dishonored SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they fay that king Paufanias being on a time in the citie of BYZANCE fent for Cleonice, a young maiden of a noble house, to take his pleasure of her. Her parents durft not keepe her from him, by reason of his crueltie, but suffered him to cary her away, The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Paulanias chamber to take away the lightes and thinking in the darke to come to Paulanias bed that was a fleepe, groping for the bedas foftly as the could to make no noyle, the vnfortunately hit against the lampe, and ouerther it. This vile fact of his did so stirre up all the confederates harres against him, that they came to beliege him in BIZANTIVM under the conduction of Ciment from whom notwithfrom he escaped, and secretly saued him selfe; And bicause that this maidens spirite would here let him reft, but vexed him continually : he fled unto the city, of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that conjured dead spirites, & there was the spirite of Cleonice conjured, to pray her to be contented. So the appeared vnto him, & told him that he fhould be deliuered of all his troubles so soone as he came to SPARTA: fignifying thereby(in my opinion)the death which he should suffer there. Divers wryters do thus reporte it. Cimon being accompanied with the consederates of the GREECIANS, which were come to him to take his parte: was advertised that certaine great men of PERSIA, & allyed to the king himselfe, who kept the city of E1088. voon the river of Strymon in the contrin of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage votothe GREECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. The AMPHICTYON vnderstandinge the matter, condemned the citie of the Scyrians to pay a great summe of money. The citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, & bad them that it robbed the marchauntes and had the goodes in their handes, pay it if they would. And the fore, bicause there was no other likely hood, but that the theeues them selues should be driven to aunswer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his army, and they would deliner their city into his handes : the which was performed. And thus Cimon having coquered this Iland, draue out the DOLOPIANS thence, & ryd the fea ÆGEVE of all pirates therby. That done, remembring that the auncient Thefeus, the sonne of AEeeus flying from ATHENS came into that Iland of SCYROS, where king Lycomedes suspecting his comming had traiteroufly flaine him . Cimon was maruelous carefull to feeke out his tombe bicause the Athenians had an oracle and prophecie, that commaunded them to bring his ashes and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knowed not where he was buried, for that the inhabitantes of the Ilande would neuer before confese where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much a doe founde the Theseubenes tombe, put his bones abord the Admirall galley sumptuously decked and set foorth, and so brought to A brought them againe into his contry, foure hundred yeares after Thefew death. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to an other, as it falleth out commonly in speeche, they entred in talke of Comons doinges: and having reheated the chiefest of them, he him selfe told one, which was the notablest and wisest parte of all the rest that ever he played. For the ATHENIANS and their confederates together, having takens great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIVE the confederates to honor him withall, gaue him the preheminence to deuide the spoyles F mongest them. Whereuppon he made the division, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by them selues, and layed the spoyles and their apparell by them selues. The

A confederates founde this distribution very vnequall : but neuerthelesse Cimon gave them the choyce to choose which of the two they would, and that the ATHEN IANS should be contented with that which they left. So there was a Samian Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue Herophytus the confederats counsel rather to take the spoiles of the Persians, then the Persians them Sanian gang the contenerate commertative to take the spoiles of the prisoners goodes and apparell, and left cheefe the foole of the prisoners goodes and apparell, and left cheefe the the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Wherupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common floride. fouldiers to be but an ill deuider of spoyle, bicause that the confederats caried away great store of chaines, karkanets, and braselets of gold, & goodly rich purple apparell after the Persian facion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainred with paine and labor, But shortly after, the parentes and frendes of these prisoners, came out of Phrygia and Lydia, and redeemed every man of them at a great raunsome: so that Cimon gathered fuch a masse of readie money together by their raunsome, as he defrayed the

brake vp all his hedges and inclosures, and layed them plaine and open, that trauellers passing by and his ownepoore citizens, might take as much frute thereof as they would, without any maner daunger. And furthermore, kept a continual table in his house, not furnished with manv diffies, but with meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore contrie men were dayly refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinary : so as they needed not otherwise care to labor for their liuing, but might be the readier, & haue the more leasure to ierue the common wealth, Yet Aristotle the Philosopher wryteth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men onely in the village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwayes certaine young men waiting on him of his household servauntes well appartelled, & if he met by chaunce as he went vp and cimone charidowne the citie, any olde citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of these younge men strip him 7. willes: and in memorie of him they celebrated the judgement of the tragicall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man had played his first tragedy, Apheblion felfe, and chaunge apparell with the olde man : and that was very well thought of, and they all honored him for it. Moreouer, these young men caried euer good store of money about would not draw them by lottes that should be judges of this play, to geue the victorie vnio them: and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or else where, that Poet that had best deserued : but when Cimon & the other Captaines were come intothe D D knowinge his pouertie, they fecretly gaue him money in his hande, and fayd neuer a worde. cimi brought the goodes to be in common amongest them, as the Poets say they were in the old time of sa turnes raigne. And now, where some accused this honest liberality of Cimon, objecting that was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good willes by that means the maner of life he led, accompanying his liberality, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow the opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke parte with the nobilitie, and lived after the LACED EMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwayes against Themistocks. who without all compasse of reason encreased the authority and power of the people: and for this cause he joyned with Aristides, and was against Ephialtes, who would for the peoples the haue put downe and abolished Ariopagus courte. And where all other gouernors in his time were extorcioners, and bribetakers: (Ariftides and Ephialtes only excepted) he to the connarie led an vncorrupt life in administracion of iustice, & euer had cleane hands, whatsoeuer he fpake or did, for the state and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any

being continually bayted and wearied, with the common accusations of these tale bearers picke thanks, that accused him to the people, he repayred at the length vnto Cimon, & brought him home to his owne dore two bowles, thone full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of filuer, which be peeces of money fo called, bicaufe that the name of Darius was with f ten vpon them. Cimon seeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the twole would rather choose: to have him his frende, or his hierling. The barbarous noble man amfwered him, that he had rather haue him his frend. Then fayd Cimon to him againe, away with thy golde and filuer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy frend, that gold and filuer shall energe at my commaundement, to take and dispose it as I have neede. About that time begannethe confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the warres against the barbarous people. defiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to have leafure to manure and husband their groundes. and to trafficke also, considering that they had driven their enemies out of their contrie, and that now they did them no more hurte: by reason whereof they payed the money they were fessed at, but they would furnish no moe men nor shippes as they had done before. Butthe other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and profecuted law against them that failed payment, condemning them in great fines, and that to cruelly, that they made the seigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary course to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and voyde ships of the that would not or could not serue in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become flothfull mongrells in their houses, by too much rest, and to transpose them selues from good souldiers which they had bene, to laborers, marchauntes, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the beaftly flothfull defire they had, to line pleasauntly at home. And contrarily, causing a great num-The original of far- ber of the Athenians one after an other to serue in gallies, he so acquainted them with conwice: and the tinuall paines in his viages: that he made them in shorte space become Lordes and masters ouer them, that gaue them pay, and entertainment. For they beganne by litle and litle to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they faw trained continually in the warres, euer bearing armor, & carving their weapons in their hands, becomming expert fouldiers at their charge, by reason of the pay they gaue them: so that in the end, they became subjects & contributaries as it were vnto the, where before they were their frendes & copanions. So as there neuer was A forthering of Passia, in all Asia, from the contrie of Ionia, directly downe to Pamphyand furthermore, being advertised that the kinges Captaines were vppon the coast of PANERYLIA with a great armie by fea, bicause he would feare them in such sorte, that they should not braue any more to shewe them selues apon the sea, on this side of the Iles of the CHREEDONIANS : he departed from the Ile of GINDOS, and from the citie of TRIOPIVM. with two hundred gallies, the which at the first had bene excellently well made and deuised by Themistocles, as well for swift sayling, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carie the greater number of men of warre in battell to affault theenemies, And so went first against the Phase Lites, who were Gree Cians borne, and vet por with standing would neither take the GREECIANS parte, nor receive their armie into their hauens: landed there, destroyed all the contrie, and then came and camped with his ar-mighard at their walles. But the men of CHIO being auncient frendes of the FASELITES, and Chio on the. in Comons armie at that iorney : did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertisement to themosthe citie of their doinges by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and shotte ouer bewalles. So as in the end they procured their peace with condicion, that the FASELITES figuld pay tentalentes for a fine; and furthermore should also follow the armie of the GREE- fello. cans, and from thencefoorth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorsus fayth, that the PERSIAN Captaine that had charge of the armie by fea, was called TITHRAYS TES, and the Captaine of the armie by lande, PHEREND ATES. But Callifthenes wweth, that Ariomandes the lonne of Gobrias, was the kinges Lieutenaunt, havinge chiefe

Which notwithstanding, when they saw the ATHENIANS come to set a-1800 them where they lay, they made out against them, a fleete of fixe hundred fayle, as Phanodemus declareth; or as Ephorus wryteth, three hundred and fifty fayle only. But the rest that were taken tardy by the way, they were slaine, and their gallies fonke or taken; whereby we may know that there were a great nuber of them, for many were fauedas it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the Athentans tooke two cimon sooke hundred of them prisoners. In the meane season, their armie by lande came neerer to the sea wo hundred Ade; which Cimon perceiving, stoode in some doubt whether he sould lande his men or not, at the battell bicause it seemed a hard & daungerous thing vnto him, to land in spight of his enemies: and fought by the to purforth the GREECIANS already wearied with the first battell against the barbarous peo-E ple, who were altogether whole, freshe, and lustie, and withall many in number against one. Neuerthelesse, perceiuing that his men trusted in their force, besides the corage which the first victorie gaue them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: hepurthem a lande while they were whorte yet with the first bartell. And so with great furie and lowde cries they ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who stoode still & stur-

But the other fought it out fo valliantly, that in the ende they wanne the field, and with maruelous difficultie made the barbarous people flye, whereof they Ciman ouerwanderine neid, and with that the place, and tooke the reft priloners with all their tents & paulions, sell-ofibe ba-F which were full of all forces of riches. Thus Cimon like a valliant champion of the holy games, become people having in one felfe day wonne two victories, and having excelled she battell by fea also, which also by lands the Greecians had wonne within the channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then upon the lande: and the battell which the GRECTANS wante by lande before the day PLATEES, with that which he wanne the day before on the featyet he was not contented with all this. For, after two fo famous victories obteined, he would once againe fight for the he nor of the tokens of triumphe: and being aduertifed that the foure score sayle of the Parisi CIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arrived at the hear) Hydra, he fayled thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this sleete, knowing certainty of the ouerthrow of their chiefest armie, but stoode in doubt of it, and would mile perswaded that it was ouerthrowen in that sorte: and therefore were they so much the interaffrayed, when they descried a farre of the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they have all their shippes, & the greatest parte of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. The victorie against the Persians did so dawnte and plucke downe the pride and lostie mindes cimentroughs the barbarous Persian king, as he made that condicion of peace fo much spoken of in the cient histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armies thenceforth should either no necrer to the GRECIAN fea, then the carrere of a horse, and that he would sayle no further forward, then the Iles Chelidonians, and Cyaneans, with any gallies or other thippess warre. Howbeit the historiographer Callisthenes wryteth, that it was no parte of any atter coprised within the condicion of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of dish great an ouerthrow : and that afterwardes he kept fo farre from the GRECTAN feet, that was eles with fiftie faile, and Ephialtes with thirty only, did fayle beyonde the Hes Caretto ho and no barbarous fleete euer came against them. And it is sayd moreouer, that the building of the long walles the iovne to the citie with the hauen, which they call the legges, was built & finished afterwards howbeit the first fundacions thereof were built with the money Cimon gave towardes it the that the worke met with moorish and watery places, by meane whereof they were dringer mo buildings, fill up the marifles, with force of flyntes & great logges, which they threw unto the bottome It was he also that first did beawtifie and set forth the citie of ATHENS, with places of liberal exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he earled plane trees to be fet in the market place: and the Academie which before was very drye and naked he made it now a pleafaunt groue, and full of goodly springes which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbors to walke in, and goodly long fmooth allies to runne a good could in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine Persians dwelling in GHERROW svs, (to fay a demy He of the contrie of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but sent to the people of high THRACIA, to pray their aide to defend them felues against Cimon: of whom they made but litle accompt, bicause he was departed from ATHENS with a very few shipped who fet vpon them only with four gallies, and tooke thirteene of theirs. And fo having uen the Persians out of Cherronesvs, and subdued the Thraceans, he conquered all Cimon draue the contrie of CHERRONESUS, from THRACIA VIITO his owne contrie. And departing from out of Thrathence went against them of the Ile of Thasos, that had rebelled against the A THENTHE and having overcome them in battell by fea, he wanne three and thirtie of their shippes, and besides that tooke their citie by siege, and wanne the mynes of goldelying beyonde the land to the ATHENIANS, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conquest made his way open into Macedon, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the best parte the cold that present time. But bicause he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he was suffer ! cted to have taken money, and to have bene bribed by presentes of king Alexander : where sed and difupon, his fecret enemies layed their heades together, and accused him. But cimon to clere charged.

Stefime-Stefimente brosse reporteth this accusation, and sayth: that his sister Elpinice went to Pericles house, (who the historium. was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to pray him not to deale so extreamely with her brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, layd, alas, thou art too old, Elpinice. thou, now toouercome these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cause came to hearinge, he was a more genue addentiate, then any only : fo that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this of March of acculation. And furthermore, folong as he was present in ATHENS, he alwayes kept the se-them, where ditious people in obedience, who would ever croffe and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, bicaule they would have all the sway and rule in their owne handes. But when Cimon was paging did fit fent abroade any whither to the warres, then the common people having no bodie to gaine to indige favthem, turned, and altered the gouernment of the citie topfie turney, and confounded all caufes of murthe auncient lawes and customes which they had observed of long time, and that by the procurement and fetting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of causes in maner from ters concer-C the court of * Areopagus, & put all authoritie of matters indiciall into the handes of the peo- ning the com-

ole, and brought the state of the citie into a pure Democratia, to fay: a common weale ruled Democratia bythe fole and absolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altoge- rule of comther favored the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne; finding thauthority of the Pericles in Senate and counfell to tham efully defaced and troden vnder foote, was marueloufly offended cimons abbenate and counted to triantening defacts and trouble with all, and fought to refore thauncient state of judgement againe as it was before, and set the committee of the committ vothegouernment of the nobility (called Optimacia) that was established in the time of cle-monwealth Abenes. But then beganne his enemies againe with open mouth to crye out vpon him, reuiuing the olde former naughty rumor that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne fifter: Democratia &furthermore accusing him, that he did fauor the LACED EMONIANS. And amongest other government D thinges there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verses of the Poet Empolis, which were made of the mobile against Cimon. And if it be so, that being thus negligent & genen to wyne, he have gotten so many cities. and wonne such sundry great battells: it is out of doubt then that if he had bene sober & carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor fince any GRECIAN Captaine, that had paffed him

E of the LACED & MONIANS : for of two twynnes which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the Lacede. thone of them Lacedamonius, and thother Eleus, as Stefimbrotus wryteth, faying that for that monian macause Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers stocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer wryteth, that both those two, and an other third called Thessalms, were borne of Modice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the sonne of Mequeles. How soener it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauor and countenaunce which the LACED & MO-MIANS gave him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him. were glad that Cimon being but a youg man, did beare more sway in ATHENS then he. Which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended with all at the beginning: bicause the goodwill of the LACED AMONIANS towardes him, did bring them great commo-

F dity. For when the ATHENIANS beganne to growe of great power, and to practife fecretly that the confederats of the GRECIANS should for fake the LACEDE MONIANS to joyne with them: the LACED EMONIANS were not angrie withall, for the honor and love they bare vnin glorie of the warres. In deede it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner cimo followed to Cimon, who did alone in maner manedge all thaffayres of GRECE at that time, bicanfelt was very curteous vnto the confederates, and also thankefull vnto the LACED E MONIANE But afterwardes when the ATHENIANS were aloft and of great power, and that they faw ci mon stuckenot for a litle matter with the LACED E MONIANS, but loued them more then they would have had him: they beganne then to enuy him, bicause in all his matters he had to do he euer highly praised and extolled the LACED EMONIANS before them. But specially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perswadethen to do any thing: the LACED EMONIANS, fayd he, I warrantye do not fo. That, as Stefinder tue fayth, made him maruelously to be maliced of the people. But the chiefest thing they ac. cused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out vpon this occasion. The fourth yeare of the raigne of Archidamus, the sonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, therefortuned the wonder a fullest and most fearefull earthquake in the citie of LACED EMON, and thereabouts, that ever was heard of. For the earth in many places of the contrie opened, and fell as into a bottom leffe pit. The mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the citie was layed on the ground and ouerthrowen, five houses only excepted, theref being wholy destroied. And it is said also, that a litle before this earthquake came, the young

And in memorie of the same the tombewhere they were afterwardes buried, is called vnto this day Sismatias, as much to fay, as the tombe of those which the earthquake had slaine. But king Archidamus foreseeine straight uppon the sodaine the daunger that was to come, by that he saw present, perceiuing his citizens busie in sauing their householde stuffe, and that they were running out of their houses: made the trompetters to found a hotte alarome vpon it, as if their enemies hadcome stealingly upon them to take the citie, to thende that all the inhabitantes should presently repayre vnto him (fettinge all busines aparte) with armor and weapon. That fodaine alarone Archidamus doubtlesse faued the citie of Sparta at that time: for the ILOTE, which are their slaves and bondmen in the contrie of LACONIA, and the contrie clownes of litle villages thereaboutes. came running armed out of all partes, to spoyle and robbe them upon the sodaine, that were n

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not ayde nortelieue a city that was an enemy vnto Athens, but rather fuffer it to fall to the ground, and to F fournethe pride and arrogancy of SPARTA vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Cricias faieth)being more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for thenlarging and encreasing of his contry: brought it to passe by his perswasion, that the Athenians sent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearfeth the very felfe wordes that Cimon spake to moue the people to graunt his request. For he besought them that they would enot suffer GRECE to halte, as if LACED EMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: not to suffer their citie to lose an other citie their frend, and subject to the yoke and defence of GRECE. Hauing therfore obteyined ayde, to leade vinto the LACEDE MONIANS, he went with his army through the Corint Hian's contry: wher with Lachartus a Captaine of Corintus was marueloufly offended, fayinge, that he should not have entred into their contrie with F an armie, before he had asked licence of them of the citie. For fayd he, when one knocketh at a mans dore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the master of the house commaundeth

A him. Butye Corint Hians (fayed Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEON EIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to comein, but have broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinkinge that all should be open vnto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stowtely aunswere the Corint Bian Captaine againe, bicause it stoode him vppon, and so went on with his armie through the contrie of CORINTHE. Afterwardes the LACED EMONIANS fent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require ayde against the MESSE-NIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their flaues) who had wonne the citie of ITHOME. But they had brought, and of their boldnes besides: wherefore they sent them backe againe, and would not imploy them of all other their confederats that came to their fuccor, bicause they thew them to be men very tickle, defiring chainge and alteracions. The ATHENIANS return nedhome, misliking much that they were sent backe againe: infomuch as euer after they haredthem that fauored the LACEDEMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDEMONIANS take therefore, taking a small occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their contrie for tenne yeres: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that Cimon banis were banished with the Oftracismon banishment. Now within the terme of these ten yeares, shed for 161 the LACED EMONIANS fortuned to vidertake the deliuery of the citie of DBLPHES, from the feruitude and bondage of the Phocians, and to put them from the cultodie and keeping of

they came to plante their campe neere vnto the citie of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the C ATHENIANS went to fight with them . Cimon understanding this, although he was in exile. came to the ATHENIANS campe armed, with intent to do his ducty to fight with his contrie menagainst the LACED EMONIANS, and so went into the bandes of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was him felfe. But his owne contry enemies cried out against him, and fayd, that he was come to none other ende, butto trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwardes bring them to the city felfe of ATHENS. Whereuppon the great counfell of the five hundred men were afrayed, and fent to the Captaines to commaunde them they should not receiue him into the battell: fo that Cimon was compelled to departe the campe. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus Anaphlystian, and his other frendes that were suspeded as him leffe was, to fauor the LACED EMONIANS doinges: that they should doe their D best endeuor to fight valliantly against their enemies, to thintent their good service at that battell might purge their innocencie towardes their contry men: and so they did. For the A-THENTANS keeping the fouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were a hundred in all. they set them aparte by them selues in a squadron, and fought it so valliantly and desperatly. that they were flaine euery man of them in the field, leaving the ATHENIAN'S maruelous fory for them, and repenting them that they had so vniustly mistrusted them as traitors to their contrie. Wherefore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partely as I am perswaded, bicause they called his former good seruice to minde which he had done to their contrie aforetime, and partely also, bicause the necessitie of the time so required it. For the ATHENI-ANS having loft a great battell before T ANA GRE, looked for no other about the fpring of the E yeare, but that the Peloponnesians would inuade them with a great power: wherefore, they reuoked Cimons banishment by decree, whereof Pericles selfe was the only author & pro- cimon called curer. Rewhen all things were in readines to departe, and the armie prest to shippe and sayle away:c. mon dreaming in the night had this vision. It seemed vnto him that he saw a bitch angrie with him, and barking earnestly at him, & that in the middest of her barking, she spake with a man voyce, and favd vnto him:

Besides this vision, as he did sacrifice to thegod Bacchus, the Priest opening the beast after it was sacrificed, about the blood that fell to the grounde, there affembled a swarme of antes, which caried the congealed blood of from the grounde by litle and litle, and layed it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together be fore any man marked it: Cimon at the last spied it by chaunce, and as he was looking of then to marke what they did, the minister of the sacrifice brought the beastes liver that was facificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this there iudged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, hauing all things readie for preparation of this iorney, so as he could not well goe backe, he launched into the sea, and hoysed sayle, and sen ding three score of his gallies into Egypt, sayled with the rest upon the coast of PARPHY LIA. Where he wanne a battell by sea of the king of Persia, ouercomming the gallies of the Phenicians and the Cilicians, and conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into Egypt. For he had no small thoughtes in his minde, but reached high enterprises, and determined vtterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mighty kingeof PERSIA, and specially for that he understoode Themistocles was in maruelous credit and reputacion amogest the barbarous people, bicause he had promised the king of Persiatolead his armie for him, and to doe him notable seruice when soeuer he shoulde have occasion wh warre with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistalls poison himselse, bicause he dispaired that he could not performe that service against GRECI which he had promised : affuring him selfe that it was no easie matter to vanquishe Cimon corage, and good fortune, who lay at that time with his armie all alongest the Ile of Cr-

PRVs, promiting him felfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane feafon, Cimon fent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iuppiter Ammon, to aske him some secret question for no man euer knew neither then nor fince, for what cause he had sent them thither neither did they also bring backe any aunswere. For they were no sooner come thither, but theorecle commaunded them straight to returne: saying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiving this aunswere, left the oracle, and tooke their iorney backet to the seawardes. Now when they were commen againe to the GRECIANS campe, which The death of at that present lay in Egypt, they heard that Cimon was departed this worlde: and recke ninge the dayes sence his death, with the instant of their aunswere received by the oracle that Cimon was then comming vnto him: they knew straight that darkely he had signified his death vnto them, and that, at that very time he was with the goddes. He dyed at the fiege of the citie of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as some reporte, or else of a hurte he received at askir-charge, to returne into their contry againe, and in no case to publishe his death: which comcimoni death maundement was so wisely and cunningly handeled, that they all came home safe, and not keps very fe- an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once understoode any thing of it. So was the f armie of the GRECIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though him felfe was dead, the space of thirtie dayes, as Phanodemus wryteth: But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Cap-

thinges, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the field, at the fiege of the walles of enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomye would in no case fall in frendshippe with a la, fearing least he should thereby put him selfe into warres : but gaue him men and shipper bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was ready to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich emerod fet in gold, which Lucullus at the first refused genen Lucui. Vntill the king shewed him his picture grauen in it: and then accepted the gift, fearing leaf the vtter refufall might cause the king thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambushe by sea for him. Thus having gotten a certaine number of shippe together of the porte townes thereaboutes, ouer and besides such as the pyrates and seams uers had hidden, being parte of their spoyles, and bestowed with their receitors; went on with them into Cypa vs, where he understoode that his enemies lay close in certaine creekes with der the foreland, watching to bourde him as he fayled by. Whereuppon he vnrigged and be stowed his shippes in docks, and sent worde to all the porte townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him vittells & other necesfarie munition to be in readines against the spring. But in the meane while, when he saw time convenient, he put his whole fleete agains to the fea with all possible speede, went him felfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe fayle, but in the night packt on all the cloth he could for life: fo that by this craftie fetche, he wanne RHODES, and loft not one shippe. The RHO DIANS they also furnished him with shippes: & besides the, he so perswaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitantes of the Ile of Co, that they for looke king Mithridates, and went to make warres with him against them of the Ile of Samos. But Lucullus him selfe alone draue kings (Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS agains to libertie: and tooks Epigonus the tyranne prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, CAL. thridates was compelled to forfake the citie of PERGAMVM, and to retyre to the citie of Pie TANE, within the which Fimbria kept him befieged very straightly by lande. Wherefore Mi. thredates having the sea open vpon him, sent for his force and nauy out of all partes, not dering to hazard battell against Fimbria, who was very valliant, of a venturous nature, & at that time moreouer was him selfe a conqueror. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates ment, and hauing no power by sea of his owne: sent straight to Lucullus to request him to come with his nauie into those partes to his ayde, for thouercomming of this king, the greatest and most cruell enemie that euer the ROM ANE people had. Bicaule that so notable a praye, which they h followed with fuch daunger and trouble, thould not escape the ROMANES, while they had him in their handes, and was come him felfe within their daunger : and that therefore he should so much the more harken vnto it, bicause that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken no man shoulde winne more honor and glorie by his takinge, then he that had stopped his paffage, and layed handes on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betwene them both: the one that had driven him from lande, and the other that had stopped his passage by sea. And furthermore, that the ROMANES would nothinge regard all the famous battells and victories of Sylla in GRECE which he had wonne before the cities of CHERONEA and ORCHOMENE : in comparison of taking the king. This was theffect of Fimbriaes meffage fent unto Lucullus, wherein there was I nothing, in the which there was not great likelyhoode. For there is no man that can doubted it, but if Lucullus would have beleued him at that time (and have gone thither with his ships to stoppe the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was belieged, confidering also that he was so necre at hande) this warre had taken ende there, and the worlde besides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwardes. But, whether Lucullus preferred the confideration and respect he had vnto Sylla, whose Lieutenaunt he was, before all other due regarde of private or common benefit : or that he detelted and abhorred Fimbria as a curied persone, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his hands in the blood of his Captaine: or else that it was through the secret prouidence and permission of the goddes that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might bere, I ferued as a worthie enemie, against whom he might afterwardes shew his valure: how source it was, it so fell out that he harkened not vnto Fimbriaes message, but gaue Mitbridaes time and leafure to flye, and finally to scorne all Fimbriaes force and powers But Luculius felfe alone Institute afterwardes ouercame the kinges armie by fea, once neete vnto the head of LeQum, which would not aide won the coast of T RO AD E: and an other time neere vnto the lle of T HNEDOS, where Neopto befreging Mi-Mithridates Lieutenaunt by fea, lay in wayte for him with a farre greater number of shridates. Appesthen he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had discried him, he sayled before all his king Mishria ranie being Admirall, in a galley of the RHODES, at flue ores to a bancke, whereof one Dema-dates Linegorss was mafter, a man well affected to the service of the Romans, and very skillfull in bat- senan by fed. fell by fea. And when Neoptolemus on the other fide rowed against him with great force, commaunding his pylor that he should so order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prowe: Demagor as fearinge the full meetinge of the kinges galley which was very strong and heatie, and furthermore well armed with poyntes and spurres of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his gallie to winde about, & turned his poupe towardes him. Whereby the galley being low at that end, received the blow without hurte. considering that they hit uppon the dead workes, and those partes which are alwayes about water. In the meane time Lucullus other shippes were come, who commaunding his master. noturne the beakehead of his gallie forward, did many famous actes: fo that he made his enemies flye, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to feeke out Syl- Luculius pus keuen as he was readie to passe ouer the seas, about Chernonesvs: holpe him to wast his amie, and so passed him ouer with safety. Afterwardes when peace was concluded, and that Mishridaes ling Mithridates was comen into his realme and contries againe, which lye vpon the fea Ma-Gior: Sylla condemned the province of Asia to pay the fumme of twenty thowsand talentes for a fyne, by reason of their rebellion. And for leauying of this fyne, left Lucullus there with commission to coyne money: which was a great comforte and hartes ease vnto the cities of Asia, confidering the extreamitie that Sylla had vied towardes them. For in fo grieuous and odious a commission vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not only behaue him selfe vprightly and justly, but also very favorably and curteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIans that were openly in armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault. and that for fatisfaction of thoffence they had committed takinge Marius parte, they should fusfer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continewe in their naughtines, he went against them, and having ouercome them in battell, compelled them Diokeepe within their walles, and layed fiege vinto their citie, where he vied this policy with them. At none dayes he launched into the sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and sayled Luculius Bratowardes the citie of ELEA: howbeit in the night time fecretly returned backe, and making the fige of no noyle, layed an ambushe nere vinto the citie. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothinge, the Minister went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watche or ward. "went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watche or ward." to spoyle the campe of the ROMANBS, supposing every man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming fodainly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, flue about fine hundred such as relifted, and wanne fixe thowfandeslaues, with an infinite quantitie of other spoyle. Now did the goddes happely preserve Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull mileries and troubles, which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIB fuffer, euen then when he E was occupied in the warres of A six: and yet notwithftanding his absence, he was in as good credit and fauor with Sylla, as any of his frendes about him. For as we have fayd before, he de- Lucultus bodicated his commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his last will and te- acred of Syllas frament appointed him Tutor vnto his sonne, leaving Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwardes between them, bicause they The first ocwere both young men, and vehemently desirous of honor. Shortly after the death of Sylla, case of quart Lucullus was chosen Consull with Marcus Cotta, about the three score Olympiade: and then Pompey and they began to reviue the matter againe, that it was very needefull to make warres against Mis- Luculius. thridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gave out that it was not ended, but only stept for a Lucallin, M. while. Wherefore, when the Confulls came to draw lottes what prouinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was maruelous forie that the province of GAVLE, lying between the Alpes and ITALIE, fell to his lotte: bicause he thought it no contrie wherein any great exploytes were to be done; and againe, the glorie of Pompey grieued him greatly, whole honor dayly increased by the famous battells he wan in Spains. So that it was most certaine, that so some as Pompey had ended the warres there, they would have chosen him generall in the warres gainst Mithridates. Wherefore, when Pompey sent to Rome in earnest maner, to require man ney to make pay to his fouldiers, wryting to the Senate, that if they did not fend him more the fooner he would leaue Sertorius there, Spaine behinde him, and bring his army backein to ITALIR: Lucallus made all the meanes he could to have it quickely fent him, fearing less he should returne into IT ALIE vpon any occasion, while he was Consul. For he thought the if he returned agains to Rome with so great an armie, he would easily do what him lift; and the rather, bicause that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the finan and rule at ROME, bicause he spake and did all that pleased the common people, being ave tious liver, and diffolutely genen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was an other common Orator among the people called Lucius Quintus, and he would have had all Soller Lucius Quin sine, a feaidoinges reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the common wealth Bious Otalor and to turmoyle the citie of Rome againe with civil differtion, which then lived quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall a parte to perswade him, ando penly reproued him with such words, that he was diffwaded from his euell purpose, & byres. fon ruled his rath ambition, handling it both wifely and as cunningly as he could poffible/for the fafety of the common wealth) bicause it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infi nite troubles were like to growe. While these thinges were thus in hande, newes came that Offanise the governor of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereuppon many put forward them selues to sue for this charge, & to courte Cethegus, as the only man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckening of the gouernment of CILICIA in respect of the contry, but bicause CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it, and perswading him selfe that if he could obtain the government thereof they would geue none other (but him felfe) the authoritie to make warres with Mithridates he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none should haue it but him selfe. hing Millini. And having proved fundry wayes, was compelled in the ende, against his owne nature.

There was a woman in Rome at that time called Pracia, very famous for Pracia a faher passing beauty, and also for her pleasaunt grace in talke and discourse, how beit otherwise fan of Rome. vnchast after curtisan manner. But bicause she employed the credit & fauor of them that fre h quented her companie, to the benefit and feruice of the common wealth, and of them that loued her: the wanne the reporte (belides her other excellent commendable graces) to bea very louinge woman, and readie to fauor and further any good enterprise, and it wanneher Ceibegus 74- great fame and reputacion. But after the had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common wealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her fight: then had she all the whole power & authority of Rome in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what ever Pracia would will him to. Thus Lucullus fought to come in fauor with her, fending her many prefentes, and vfing all other curtesies he could offer vnto her: besides that it seemed a great reward forto prowde & ambitious a woman as she, to be sued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by E this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his comaundement. For Cethegus did nothing burchmend Luculius in all assemblies of the people, to procure him the government of Cicaria who after it was once graunted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Pracia normal of Cetheeus. For the people wholly of them selues with one cosent did graunt him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, bicause he knew better how to ouercome him, then anyother Captaine, and bicause that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellius also growen too olde, both which two were the onely men that could deservedly have contended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Confull, made fuch fute to the Senate, that they fent him also with an armie by fea, to keepe the coastes of Pine-PONTIDE, and to defende the contrie of BITHYNIA. Thus, Luculius having his commission; went into Asia with one legyon only, the which he leavied a new at Rome: & when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he founde there, which were men marred and

A corrupted altogether of long time, through couetoufnes and delicacle of the contribution amingest others, were the bandes which they called the Fimbrian bandes, men gaven ouer to selfewill, and very ill to be ruled by marshall discipline, bicause they had lived a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were those selies souldiers that together with Fimbria, flue their generall Flaccus, Confull of the ROMANE people, and that af- diffilms and nerwardes betrayed Fimbria him felfe, and forfooke him, leaving him vnto Sylla, being muti- corrupted. ners, traitors, and wicked people: howbeit otherwife very vallyant, well trayned, and painefull fouldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in shorte time brideled their boldnes meetely well, and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my ominion) what the value of 2 good Captaine and Generall ment, that knew how to commaund : but were vied to flattering leaders; that commaunded the fouldiers no more then they them felues liked of. Now concerning the state of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bolde (as these florishing Sophisters commonly are) vndertaking warre against the ROMANES, with a vaine unprofitable armie, but passing freshe and sumptuous to Mithridates against the that he was once foyled and ouercome with no lesse shame then losse, when Luculus: he came to make this fecond warre, he cut of all superfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a convenient furniture to serve for warres at all assayes. For he put by the confused multinude of fundrie nations, the fierce threatninges of the barbarous people in so many fundrie rongues, and clearely banisht also the riche grauen armors with goldesmythes worke, and set with precious stones, as thinges that more enriched the enemies that wanne them, then gaue frength or corage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMANE facion, and great heavy shields, and brought to the field a maruelous number of horse, more ready for service, then riche in furniture. Then he joyned fixe score Milbridates thowsand footemen together, appointed & fet in order like vnto the battell of the ROMANES, amile, with fixteene thow fand horse of service, besides those that drue his armed cartes with sethes about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And besides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of shippes and gallies together, which were not decked with goodly golden paullions, as at the first, neither with stoones nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and gentlewomen : but furnished full of armor, artillerie, and flinges, and with money also to pay the souldiers. With all this armie and pren paration, he went first to inuade BIT HYNIA, where the cities received him very gladly. & not those only, but all the other cities of As IA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former mileries and diseases, by the crueltie of the ROMANE farmers and vierers, who raising Asafellines taxes and impostes vppon them, made them abide vntollerable thinges. It is true that Luculling from mife draue them away afterwardes, like the Harpya, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens Romane vie. mowthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by ress. the perswasions he vsed vnto them, and qualified a little the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being bufie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Confull (and his companion) supposing that the ab- conta the cofence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered him to doe notable service, prepared to fight with full our come by Milbi-Muthridates. And although he had newes brought him from fundrie places, that Lucullus dates in bas-was with his armie in Phrygia, and comming towardes him: yet notwithstanding imagi- rest. ning that he had the honor of triumphe affured alreadie in his handes, and bicause Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he advanced forwardes to gene battell. But Mithridates onercame him both by fea and by lande: fo that Cotta by fea loft three fcore of his shippes with all the men in them, foure thowfand footemen by lande, and was after with shame thut vp and besieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelesse to escape, but by Lucullus onely ayde and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leave Cotta, and to go further, affuring him that he should finde the realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: fo that he might eafily be Lord of the F whole. And these were the wordes of the souldiers that spyted Cotta, bicause his soolishe raftnes and fonde imagination had not only brought those men to the shambles to be staine and cast away, whom he had the leading of but had let them also, that they could not outcome him, and ende this warre without blowes, for that they were driven to go to his helpe A Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration vnto them, aunswered, that he had rather faue the of one ROMANE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when the faming of a ci- chelaus, (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenaunt in Bosor I A in the first warres against Solle and now in this seconde warre tooke parte with the ROMANES) affured him that so someas they sawe him in the realme of Pontvs, they would all rise against Mithridates, and veele them selves vnto him: Lucullus aunswered him thus, that he would not shewe him selfe more fearefull, then the good hunters which neuer fuffer the beaft to recouer his denne. And when he had so sayd, he marched with his armie towardes Mithridates, having in all his came thirtie thowsand footemen, and two thowsande fine hundred horse. When he came so neem vnto his enemies, that he might easily at eye discerne all their hoast, he wondered at the great multitude of fouldiers that were in their campe, and was in minde to geue battell, supposing vet that the better way was to prolong time, and drawe these warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMANE Captaine, whom Sertorius had fent out of SPAYNE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of fouldiers: came forwardes, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his parte did put his men also in a readinesse to fight. But euen as both battells were preparedm iovne, the element opened vpon the fodaine, without any shewe of chaunge of weather decerned before, and they plainly faw a great flake of fire fall betwene both armies, in forme and fire fell be-

shape much like to a tonne, and of the colour of molten filuer. This celestiall figne put both tharmies in fuch a feare, as they both retyred, and fought not a stroke: and this wonderful armies, out of fight fortuned (as it appeared) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Nowe Lucullus after of she element. wards confidering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world that could suffice to vittell so many thowsandes of people as Mithridates had in his campea ny long time together, hauing his enemies campe so lying before them: willed that one of

Liticke confithe prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabin, then what come he had left in their cabbin. And when the pridissipher the foner had aunswered to all his demaundes, he returned him to prison, and sent for another then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of vittells they had, with the number of men the same thould maintaine : he founde that all would be spent in three or source dayes at thus might take the citie of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowen before with Cottage the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had loft three thowsande men, and tenne of their thippes. And bicause that Luculius should not understand of his enterprise, Mithridates stales. way by night after supper, taking the oportunity of a darke rainy night, and marched thitherwardes with such speede, that he was before the city of Cyzicvs by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddeffe Adrastia standeth, which is the goddesseof fatall destinie. Lucullus receiving intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, fol- E lowed him straight wayes steppe by steppe, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in disorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiously seated also vppon the high wayes, and through fare of the neighbors therabouts, by the which they must come of necessity to vittel Mithridates campe, Wherefore Lucullus wifely forefeing what would follow: would not keepe his purpose secret from his fouldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, tolde them openly by manifest demonstration of affured hope, that ere many dayes paffed, he would geue victorie into their handes, and that without losse of one droppe of blood. In the meane season, Mithridates environmed the GRECIANS round about by lande, having deuided his armie into tenne campes, & flopped vp the mouth of the arme of the fea, which deutdeth the citie from firmelande, with his thippes from one fide to an other. Now the CYZICENIANS were valliant men, and determimost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of bat-II tell. So he caused a maruelous deale of wheate to be brought into his campe out of euclie quarter, that the same being throughly vittelled, he might easily tary the occasion which his enemies necessitie should offer him . Mithridates in the meane time , sought which way he

But Mithridates fouldiers deceived them, for thewing them the ROMANES campe that lav shoughard by them, fayd vnto them: doe ye fee yonder campe there? They are the MEDES. and the Armenians, whom Tigranes hath fent to the ayde of Mithridates. These wordes The frantand the Akmentars, which are the control of the con

Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax. whom Archelaus sent vnto them, but they would not beleue him at the first, taking it for a tale, only Bromake them be of good corage, and valliantly abide the furie of the fiege: vntill fuch time as a litle boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had take him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whome they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them. thinking they reasted to aske that questio of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he (hewed them the ROMANBS campe with his finger: then they beleued it in deede, and were coragious againe. There is a lake neere vnto the citie of Crzic vs called Dascylitide, and it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in acarte, and so caried it to the sea, and there put as many souldiers in her as she could well cary, who by night entred into the citie, the skowte of the enemies neuer discoying them. This mall supply did maruelously comforte the besieged CYZICENIANS: and it seemeth that the C goddes, deliting to fee their noble corage, would further increase and affure the same by many manifest tokens which they sent from heauen, and specially by one which was this. The day of the feast of Proferpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cowe to offer in folemne facrifice, as their aunciet ceremonies required: fo they made one of paste, & brought ithard vnto the aulter. Now, the cowe that was vowed to this facrifice, & which they recred A wonderfull vpofpurpose to serue for that day, was feeding amongest the heard of the citie in the fieldes, token of a onthother side of the arme of the sea. But that day she kept alone from all the rest of the heard, to offer her and fwamme over the arme of the fea, and came into the citie: where the went of her felfe vn- felfe to the to the place of the facrifice. Furthermore, the goddesse Froserpina her selfe appeared vnto A-Civiceniania so vehement bigge, that in a moment it burst all these engines a funder, and specially a tower overthrewe it to the ground. And it is fayd furthermore, that in the citie of I LIVM the god-desse Minerua appeared vnto diverse in their sleepe, all in a sweat, and showing parte of her vaile torne, as if the had bene newly retorned from geuing ayde vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmacion whereof, the inhabitantes of I LIVM haue a piller yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruelous fory for the breaking & loffe of his engines, by meanes wherefithe CIZICBNIANS had escaped the daun-ning when the secretarie had tolde them his vision, the CIZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddesses wordes, and could not imagine what they ment. Howbeit at the breake of day there role a great whiftling winde, that made the lea billowes rife very high: and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the citie to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides 2 THESSALIAN enginer had made and denised) began to make such a noyse, and to breake in peeces by the roughnes of the winde, that a man might eafily judge what would follow upon it. Then all at one instant, the southwinde was become ger of affaulte,& of the fiege in like maner, vntill he truly vnderstood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be fuch, as the fouldiers were compelled to care Extreame famans fleshe, which (his Captaines abusing him) had for a time kept fecret from his know-thridates F ledge. what he could possible to cut of all the vittells from him. And therefore one day when London lus was gone to affault a castell that troubled him very neere vnto his campe: Mithridatesk cause he would not lose that oportunity, sent the most parte of his horsemen to get vinels BITHYNIA, with all his cartes, and beaftes of cariage, and his most vnprofitable footenea Lucullus hearing thereof, returned agains the felfe fame night vnto his campe, and thener morninge betimes being in the winter season, followed them by the tracke with ten entirgues of footemen only and all his horsemen. But the snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sham and the weather for ough, that many of his fouldiers not being able to abide it, dyed by the way. For all that he marched on still, till he ouertooke his enemies about the river of Rinds.

a maruelous great number, as a man may judge in such a case: and neuerthelesse there were shridases taken fixe thowfande horse of seruice, an infinite number of beastes for cariage, and fifteen thowsande men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his campe, and passed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the historiographer Saluft, who wryting of this matter fayth, that here was the first time that ever the ROMANES faw any camells. Me thinks it straunge how he should thinke so, that they who long before had ouercomen Antiochus the great under Scipio, and thothers that a little before had fought against Archelaus, necrevon the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHERONEA, should not have seene camells. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, resolued with him selfimmediatly to flie, with all the speede he could possibly make: and to entertaine and stay is fea, into the fea of GRECE. But as Aristonicus was ready to hoyse fayle, his owne men betried him, and deliuered him into the handes of Lucullus, with tenne thowfand crownes which he caried with him, ro corrupt if he could parte of the ROMANES army. Mithridates hearing of Mithridates fled by fea. this, fled by fea, leauing the rest of his armie by lande in the handes of his Captaines, tobe brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the river of Granicus. Lucullus onerwhere he set apon them, and after he had slaine twenty thowsande of them, tooke an infinite shroweth Minumber prisoners. And they say there dyed in that warres, what souldiers, what slaues, what footemen by lackeis, and other stragglers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred the river of thowfand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the citie of Cyzicvs, where after helped Granicus, spent some dayes, enjoying the glorie due vnto him, and received the honorable entereinment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visite the coast of Hellespont, to get shippes to gether, and to prepare an armie by sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he flept in the night, it feemed to him he faw the god desse appeare before him, which sayd these verses vnto him. O Lyon fierce, and stoute: why sleepest thou so sounde? Since at thy hande fo fayre a praye, is ready to be founde.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his frends to him, tolde him the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came fome vnto him from the citie of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene gallies of kinge ! Mithridates, having five ores to every bancke, that were seene in the haven of the ACHAIANS, and that fayled towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke shippe straight, went and tooke them enery one: for at his first comming he slue the Captaine called Isidorus, and went afterwardes to the other mariners that lay at ancker on the coast side, who seeingehim come, drew towardes land with their shippes, in purpose to runne them all a shore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus fouldiers, bicause they could not compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had layed their shippes was such, as there was no way to force them before, their gallies floting in the fea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much a do all this notwithstanding, found meanes in the end to put a shore certaine of the best fouldiers he had about him, in a place of F the Ile where they might eafily lande. These souldiers went straight and set upon the enemies behinde, flue some of them even at their first comming, & compelled the rest to cut a funder

A therables that faitned the gallies to the banckes. But when they thought to flie from lande, Lucultus or thegallies brused and brake one an other : and that worst of all was, ranne vpon the povntes nercaute Miand fourres of Luculling gallies. And so many of them that stoode about harches were slaine; who feet werest taken prisoners: amongest whom, Marins the ROMANE Captaine was brought was Blacullus, whom Sertorius had fent out of SPAINE VINO Mithridates. He had but one eye, and I usullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye: bicause Marius should not dye so happy a death, as to be flaine, but that he thould dye fome shamefull death, and be condemned by order of lawe. That done, Lucultus went in persone with all the speede he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to finde him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Voconius should have stayed him: for he had sent this Poconius before with a certaine number of thippes vnto the citie of NICOMEDIA to flob him from flying. But he taried fo long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA facrificing to the goddes! of the fame, and to be received into the fraternitie of their religion, that he could never after comencere Mithridates to stoppe him from flying : having alreadie made fayle with all the whole fleete, and hasting with all possible speede to recouer the realme of Pontys, before turullus could returne from whence he went. But in fayling thitherwardes, he met with fuch are rible frome, that caried parte of his shippes so away, that they ranne stragling to seeke their fortune, and parte of them splitted and drowned outright: fo that all the coastes and rinersthereabouts, for many dayes after, were full of dead bodies and shippewrackes cast a there by wanes of the fea. Nowe for Mithridates owne persone, he was in a shippe of great Mithridates burden, the which for her greatnes could not sayle neere the shore, nor recouer land, she was in great dailalso very euill to be guided by the pylots in so boysterous a storme: the mariners besides were season the

put out of all their skill and knowledge, and the shippe her selfe moreover tooke in such store ofwater, and was so heavely charged withall, that they durit no more put her out to the sea. Bureason whereof Mithridates was compelled to goe abord a litle pinase of pyrates, and to. pur him felfe and his life into their handes, by whose helpe in the ende, (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to lande, and recoursed the citie of H BRACLEA in the realime of Pontys. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauerie Lucullus shewed VIIto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauor of the goddes. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of these warres to prepare a great name of n thippes, and therewithall had geuen order also for three thow sande talentes: Lucultus stayed charge and great preparation he would be strong enough to drive Mithridates from the sea, with the onely (hippes he would borrowe of their frendes and confederates. And in deede, theullus one through the special fauor of the goddes, he brought it soto passe: for they say, that this ter- bition comriblestorme that destroyed the armie of Mithridates, was raised up by Diana, being offended mendable, with the men of the realme of Ponrys, bicause they had destroyed her temple in the citie of PriApos, and had caried away her image. Now there were divers that counfelled Lucullus to deferre the rest of this warre, vntill an other season: but notwithstanding all their persiva-them by letters that they should not doe it, wryting brauely vnto them, that without all this hous he went through the contrie of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the realme of Mi- Lincollins ior-Ethnidates. In the which voyage, at the first beginning he lacked vittells, so that there were thit-ney into Pon-Withowland men of GALATIA following his campe, that carried enery one of them a builtell of wheate on their shoulders: howbeit entring further into the contrie, and conquering the whole, there was fuch exceeding plenty of all thinges, that an oxe was fold in his campe but for a Drachma, & a flaue at four etimes as much. And of all other spoyle there was such great Anoxe flore, that either they made no reckening of it, or elfe they made hauoke of it, bicause there bought for a was no man to fell it vnto, every man having fo much of his owne. For they ranne over all the contrie vnto the citie of THEMISCYRA, and to the vallies that lay apon the river of Thermodon, and stayed no where lenger then they were a spoyling. Thereupon the fouldiers be- The muting ganne to murmure at Lucullus, bicause he assured all the cities vpon composition, and neuer of Lucullus tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich them selues by spoyle: and yetfayd they, he would make vs now go further, and leane Amis vs agreat rich citie which we might eafily take by force, if it were but a litle straightly besieged, and lead ve into the de-fertes of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALD EIANS to fight against Mithridates. Lucullings A fed ouer all these complaints, and made no reckening of them, bicause he would never be thought that they would have fallen into fuch mutinie and furie, as afterwards they did and Lucullist ora- contrarily excused him selfe the more carefully to them that blamed & reproued him forbie tion to excuse long tarying vpontownes and villages that were not worth the reckening, and fuffering the thridates in the meane time to gather a new force and armie together at his pleafure. For Gid " he, that is the marke I shotte ar, and that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I doe, wi-" thing nothing more, then that he might once againe make him felfe strong, and bringafe. Furthermore, it is but a litle way from the contrie of the CABIREND ,, ANS VIIto the realime of Armenia, where Tigranes the king of kinges inhabiteth, whose no. " wer is so great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS OUT of Asia, and carieth whole townes and " cities of GRECE vnto the realme of MEDIA, who hath all SYRIA and PALESTINE inhis " handes, and hath flaine and rooted out the kinges and fucceffors of the great Seleucus, and

" hath caried away their wines and daughters prisoners by force. This great and mightie kinge is allyed vnto Mithridates, for he maried Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates shall come and intreate him to helpe him in his distresse, that Tigranes will per mema, maried fuse him, but rather we must thinke certainly that he will make warres ypon vs in his desence. And thus, in making hast to drive out Mithridates, we shall bring our selves into great days " ger, to prouoke a new enemie, euen Tigranes against vs, who of long time hath lurked for " iust occasion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honester cause to take armes, the " to defend and kepe a king his neighbour, and to neere a kinfeman, from vtter destruction, and one that is compelled to feeke vpon him for fuccor. What neede we then to prouoke himm procure it, and teache Mithridates (which he purpofeth not) to whom he should repayre for aide, to make warres against our selves, and pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with ", our owne handes into the way to go feeke aide of Tigranes: which of him felfe he will neue ,, doe, (thinking it a dishonor vnto him) onlesse we drive him to it for very necessitie. Is it not it " better for vs to gene him leafure and time, to gather a fecond force againe of him felfe, and " his owne people, that we might rather fight with the COLCHIANS, TIBARENIANS, CAP-" PADOCIANS, and with such other people whome we have so many times overcome: then which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed ouer the river of Lycus, & went I and presented battell to the ROMANES in the plaine field. There the horsemenskirmished, & the ROMANES had the worfe: for there was one Pomponeus a ROMANE taken, of great estimate cion, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if infauing his life, and healing his woundes, he would become his feruaunt and frend. Straighterplyed Pomponeus, with all my hart quod he, fo that thou make peace with the Romanes: f. not, I will euer be thine enemie. The king esteemed his corage much, and would doe him so mane soudier. hurt. And as for Lucullus, he was affrayed to come into the plaine, bicause his enemie was the ftronger of horsemen: and he doubted also on thother side to take his way by the mountains, bicause it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woddes and forrestes. But as he stook thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chaunce that were fled, and hidden in F caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promifed Le cullus if he would beleue and follow him, he would bring him into a fure ftrong place to lodge

" with the MEDES and ARMENIANS? With this determination Lucullus taried a great while before the citie of A misvs, continuing this fiege of purpole, without diffressing thematall. Afterwardes when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the siege, and him selfe with the rest of his armie went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neere vito

A his campe, where was a castell about the citie of CABIRA. Lucullus beleued the olde mans wordes, wherefore fo foone as night came, he raifed great fires in his campe, and went his way and after they had paffed certaine straight and daungerous waves of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place which Artemidorus had promitted to bring him. Now the enemies were maruelously amazed when day light came, to see him there ouer them; in a placewhere if he lift to fight, he might come apon them with aduantage: and if he liked not ro flutte, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stoode indifferent then to hazard battell or not. But in the meane feason, they say certaine of the kinges campe by chaunce were a hunting the harte. The ROMANES perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them of by the way: and they began by this meanes one to charge an other in such sorte, reliefe growing still from ei-R ther side, as Mithridates men grew the stronger. But the ROMANES seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in such a rage, that they all ranne in a choller to Lu-cullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and geue them a fignall to fight. Lucullus, bicause he would shew them by experience how much the presence & eye of a good wise Capraine in time of neede was worth : commaunded them they thould not once sturre, and he The fight of him selle in persone went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the first of his men a bassellist of he met withall flying, to ftay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make force, their enemies returne, that before had them in chase, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne forte. Afterwardes vppon his returne againe to his campe, he C fette his fouldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to shamethem withall, which the Apoliticke ROMANES are wont to vie in such a case: & that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelve deufe of the footelonge, being in their shirtes, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeinge punish them doe it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DAR- sowards foul-PARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vpon the marishes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his persone, vallyant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good judgement to doe any great enterprise as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of People they great good grace and entertainment in companie, knowing how to facion him felfe with all men. This prince, being alwayes at strife with other Lordes of his contrie, and contending who should have the first place of honor and favor about the king : went vnto Muthridates, & D promifed him that he would do him notable feruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very glad of this promife, and praifed him marueloufly in fecret: howbeit openly of purpose he did him many injuries, bicause he might have some colour to counterfeate anger and displeasure, and to gene way for him to goe yelde him selfe vnto Lucullus as he did. Lucullus was maruelous glad of him, bicause he was one of the chiefest men of name in all his Limitus datecampe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly in the which he behaued him ger by Ouhafelfe fo well, that Lucullus greatly esteemed his wisedome, and commended his diligence, in 59. fuch forte that he did him this honor, to call him fomtimes vnto the counfell, and make him fitathis borde. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to have found fit Olthacus occasion to execute his enterprise, he commaunded his footemen to be ready with his horse Dardarians. E out of the trenches of the campe: and at none dayes when the fouldiers tooke rest, and slept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to have found no body there to kepe him from comming in, confidering the familiaritie Lucullus shewed him, faying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of and fure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if fleepe that casteth away so many other Captaines, had not at that time preserved & faued Lucullus that flept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by Lucullus life good fortune kept the dore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, bicause Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of fleepe, was but then newly layed downe to reft. Othacus whatfocuer the other fayd to him, would not be fo aunswered, but tolde him he would come in whether he would or not, for he must nedes speake with him in a matter of great im-

F portaunce. Menedemus aunswered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessarie, then the preservation of his masters life and health, who had neede to take rest: and with these words, he thrust him backe with both his hands. Olibacus was affrayed and rode straight to Mithridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and oportunity of time, eucning matters delinereth meanes, to faue or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicine

called Sornatins to get vittells, with tenne enfignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his tayle one of his Captaines also, called Menander, vnto whom

Lucullus fent an other of his Lieutenauntes called Adrianus with a great companie of foul diers. to get vittells into his campe more then he thould neede. Mithridates did not let linge this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines also called Menemachus and Mina with a great number of men, as well footemen as horfemen: all which were flaine, two only excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which he fought to falless well as he could, saying that the losse was much lesse then it was thought for, and that it form the chiefest Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: & Hermens the Priest of the facrifices was troden under foots, and smoothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great

But Adrianus at his returne. passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiestie, carying a huge number of camp loden with corne and spoyles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates selie into so greated spaire, & all his people into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remove thence. Whereupon, the nobility and fuch as had place of credit about him, beganne to fend before, and secretly to conuey their stuffe out of the campe, but veterly prohibiting othersm doe the same. for they were very neere him: but the couetouines of the fouldiers was the loffe of the prave they had so long sought for, with so great paine and hazard of battells, and depriued Luculus of the honor and reward of all his victories. For they were so neere vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer fo litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and silver (whether by Astraigeame chaunce, or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely habandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwixt him that fled, &the Ro-MANES that followed: who stayed there to robbe the gold & filter, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wanne ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come ! neere him againe. And this loffe was not all which the couetouines of the fouldiers made to cullus to lofe. For, one of the chiefest secretaries of the king being taken, called Callifrance, whom Lucullus commaunded to be brought vnto him to his camper they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fine hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedines of them, flue him by the way, and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle andde stroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the citie of CABIRA, and many other castells and strong places, where he founde great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the GRECIANS, & many Princes a kinne vnto the kinghim felfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then feeing them felues deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with themselves they? were not only taken out of prison, but reuiued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates fifters called Niffa, whose taking fell our profitable forher

Neverthelesse he did his best endance at that time to helpe the poore citie againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly aftering was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that turns ched it: and Lucullus selse before he left the citie, made a great number of the houses which o were foovled by fire, to be built vp againe, and curreoutly received all the inhabitauntes that were fled, befides them he placed other GRECIANS there also, that were willing to dwellamongelt them, and increased the boundes and confines of the citie which he gaue them one hundred and ewenty furlonges into the contrie. This citie was a colony of the ATHENIANS who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire florished, and that they ruled the feas: by reason whereof, many flying the tyranny of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the fame. This good happe fell your them. that forfaking their owne goodes, they went to possesse and enjoy the goodes of other men but the very citizens of ATHENS it selfe that had escaped from this great desolation. Lucally clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and fent them agains in to their contrie. Transion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Murana begoes of Lucultus and Lucultus having graunted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dollies ry discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in bestowing this prisoner uppon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Murana should take him for a bondeman, whereby he should neede afterwardes to make him free. For fee ming to make him free, and restore him to libertie was no more but to take that freedome and liberty from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other thinges, and not in that only, Murana layed him felfe open to the world, that he had not all the partes a worthy Cape taine should have in him. When Lucullus departed from A MI S V S, he went to visite the cities of As 1A, to thend that whileft he was not now occupied with warres, they might have four !! refreshing of lawes and instice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long rimein As SIA, the poore contry was to afflicted, and opprefied with to many enils and miferies tand man living would feant below, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreame and hos rible conetonines of the farmers, customers, and ROMANE vierers did not only denoure in but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were drivento fell their goodly young fonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the interest and viery of the money which they had borowed to discharge their fines withall: & publikely the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the statues of their goddes, and other church juells; and ver in the end they them selves were also judged to be bondmen & slaves to their cruell creditors, to weath out their dayes in miserable seruitude. And yet the worst of all was, the payne they pur them ! to before they were fo condemned for they imprisoned them, fer them on the racke, tormed sed them yppon a litle brafen horfe, fette them in the flockes, made them flande naked in the

Mithridates at the beginning of his warres had fent him Ambaffador vnto Tigranes, to pray ayde of him against the ROMANES. At which time Tigranes sayd vnto him bur what fayest thou to it Metrodorus: what aduise wilt thou geue me? Metrodorus either bicaule he had regard vnto Tigranes profit, or else bicause he was loth Mithridates should escapean fwered himagaine. Whereat Tigranes was hartely forie, and repented him greatly to have tolde himfo much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, having but only reuiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued against him . For he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereat Tigranes buried his body honorably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead body of him, whom B liuing he had betrayed. Lucullus being advertised of it, entred the citie, put eight thowsande Lucullus saof the CILICIANS to the fword which he found there, and reftored the natural cirizens and keth Simpe in inhabitantes thereof to all that was theirs. But the original cause that made him to be carefull to preserve the city, was this vision he had . dates were ready to come downe into Lucaonia, and Cilicia, bicause they might first enter Asia. Lucullus marueled much at Tigranes counsell, that fithence he was minded to warre with the ROMANES, he did not vie Mithridates ayde in his warres at fuch time, as when he was in his best strength and force: and that he did not then joyne his power with Mitbridates. rather then suffer him to be destroyed and ouerthrowen, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding him felfe with those, that could not helpe them selues. But Lucullus all that, marched on with his army with all the possible speede he coulde, so that he came few dayes vnto the river of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough by reasons to the riber of the winter season: which troubled him maruelously at that present, doubting least it would found it very hold him there a long time in finding out of boates, & making of postes and planckes to build high, and a bridge to passe ouer his army. But towardes night the water beganne to fall a litte, and in the rough. The fireunge and fodaine night fell fo much, that the next morning the river was comen to her ordinary streamer and a moreouer, the contrie men them selues decerning certaine litle Ilandes that appeared was fall of the rithem in the middest of the water course, and the river very calme as a marrishe rounde about ner of Enthem, did honor Lucullus as a god, bicaufe it was a thing they had neuer feene chaunce before phrases from as though at his comming the river had sodainly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to geue him safe and easie passage. only the marke of the goddesse, which is a lampe printed upon their bodies, and they areno easie to be taken when one would have them, but with great a doe. One of these consecrated kvne, after that Lucullus army was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe vpon a rock which they suppose is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddesse, bowing downe her head, and stretching out her necke, like those that are tyed shorte, as if she had comen euen of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as the was. And besides her, he sacrificed a bull also vnto the river Euphrates, in token of thankes for his safe passage over. Lucullus the first offer her felfe day did nothing but encampe him felfe only, on the other fide of the river: but the nextmos-10 Liculius 10 ning, and the other dayes following, he went further into the contry by the way of SOPHENELL The course of hurring none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly received his army. For when his men would have had him to have take a castell by force, where they said was great stored gold and filuer: he shewed them mownte Taurus a farre of, and told them it is that which we must rather go to take. As for the thinges which be in this castell, they be kept for them that vanquishe: and going on still with great iorneys, passed ouer the river of Tigris, and so entre therealme of ARMENIA with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the first man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus comming, had no ioy of it: for he cut of his head for his labor. And therefore from thenceforth there durft no man fay any thing vnto him, vntill such time as he was at the last enuironned rounde with fire, which Lucullus army had raised about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was sporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus in deede were a noble Captaine, if he durft butta-TY Tigranes comming downe in the citie of Exhausvs only, and howe he would straightflie out of all Asia, so some as he might but heare tell of his comming against him with so miumphing an army of so many thow and men. And thus may we see, that like as all bodies and braines, are not a like strong nor able to cary much wine: so in like case all wittes be not resolute and constant, neuer to doe amisse, nor to swarue from reasons bandes in great prosperity. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the troth: whose boldnes had little better reward for his newes, then the furth that was beheaded. For Tigranes fent him immediatly with three thowfand horse, and a good deh Milhre- number of footemen, commaunding him that he should bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, and F that furthermore, he should marche vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus alreadie camped with parte of his army, & the other parte comming after, when his skowtes brought a himnewes of the barbarous Captaines approache: which at the first out him in feare that if theenemy (hould come and affaile them thus feattered in companies, & not raunged in bacrell and ready to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in oil order. And therefore beremained within his campe to fortifie the same, and sent Sextilines one of his Lieutenaunts, Lucullan ferwith a thowland fixe hundred horse, and as many footemen (or a few more) as well maked as against Misamed: commaunding him to approach as neere to his enemy as he could without fighting; in baryanda only to flay him there, vntill fuch time as he heard newes that all his army was come together into his campe. Sextilius went to doe his commaundement, but he was compelled to fight;

And Murana following king Tigranes at the heeles, spyed an occasion to genethe charge as he passed a long and narrow valley, in the bottome wherof the way was very ill, and specially for an armie of such a length: & taking the oportunity, set apon the rereward, which C. Tioranes perceiuing, fled ftraight vpon it, making all his cariage to be throwen downe in the way before the enemies to fray them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS flavne in this ouerthrow, and moe taken. Those thinges having this successes, Execultus went to the ci-Wof TIGRANO CERTA, the which he besiegeth round. In that citie were a maruelous number Lucillas beof GRECIANS that had bene brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the bar-granound barous people also whom they had vsed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the AD I-

and cities Tigranes had destroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reafon whereof, this city of TIGRANGERTA was full of golde and filter, of mettells, Ratues, rables and pictures, bicause every man (as well private, as Princes and Lords) studied to please fell for geuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuy the glory of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus diffwade him from battell. For which respect Tigranes would not somuch as tary for him, and bicause also Mithridates should have no parce of the honor of his victory: but went into the fielde with all this great army, vaunting amongest his famis

D theking, to enrich and beawtifie this city, with all kindes of furniture and ornamentes fit for thesame. And hereuppon Lucullus straighted the siege as much as he could, perswading him selfe that Tigranes would neuer suffer, that it should be taken, but (though he had otherwise determined) yet for very anger would prefent him battell, thereby to enforce him to raise his siege. And surely he gessed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had dissiwaded him by expresse letters and messengers that he should in no case hazard battell, and perswaded him rather to cut of the vittells on all fides from the ROMANES with his horsemen. The selfe same counsell and adusse did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates sent) geue him in his campe, Taxilesporand prayed him very earnestly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROM ANES. Fradesh Ti-Tigranes pacientile harkened to their reasons at the first. But when the Armenians were fight with the E come, and all the force of the contry besides, and the GORDIENIANS, and that the kinges of Romanies the Medes and of the Adiabenians were common also with all their power, and that on thother fide there came a maruelous great hoft of the ARABIANS that dwell apon the fea of BABYLON, and a multitude of the ALBANYANS from the Caspian sea, and of the IBBRIANS their neighbors, besides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by theriuer of Araxes, some comming freely to doe him pleasure, other for their pensions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table nor in counfell. but of affured hope of victorie, and of great bragges and barbarous threatninges, fo that Taxiles was in great dauger of him felfe, bicaufe he was against the determination taken in counliars as they reporte, that nothing grieued him but one; that he should fight with lone, and not with all the other ROMANE Captaines. Now this brauery was not fo forder fo farre out of square, but that there was great likelyhoode of it when he saw so many similar nations about him, fo many kinges that followed him, fo many battells of armed footene and so many thowsande of horsemen. For he had in his army of bowmen and slinges one twenty thowfand : fine and fifty thowfand horfemen, whereof feuenteene thowfande menor armes, armed from toppe to toe, as Lucullus him felfe wrote vnto the Senate: and a hundred and fifty thowsand armed footemen, deuided by ensignes and squadrons: of pyoners, carnin. ters, masons, and such other kinde of handy craftes men, to plaine wayes, to make bridgesm passe ouer rivers, to stoppe streames, to cut worde, and to make such kinde of workes, of this forte of people, the number of fine and thirty thowfand, who followed in battell ray in there. reward of the army, making their campe seme farre greater, & by so much the more stronger When Tigranes shewed on the toppe of mount Taurus, and that they might plainly seeking whole army from the city, and that him felfe also might easily decerne Lucullus armie that he fieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the citie were fo glad of this fight, that they made wonderfull howtes of ioy, and great clapping of handes, threatming the ROMANES from their walles, and shewing them the army of the Armenians, Lucullus inche meane time fate in counfell to confider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his siege, and goe with his whole armie vndeuided against Tigranes. But others liked northat he should leaue so great a number of enemies at his backe, neither than he should raise his siege. Lucullus made them aunswere, that neither of them both did count fell him well, but both together did counfell him right: Whereuppon he deuided his amir. and left Murens at the fiege of TIGRANO CERTA with fixe thowfand men: and he with four and twenty cohortes (in the which were not about tenne thowfand armed footemen) and all his horfemen, with a thowfand bow men and flinges or thereabouts, went towardes Tigran, and camped in a goodly broade fielde by the rivers fide. The Romanes feemed but a hand full to Tigranes campe, so that for a while Tigranes parasyts made but a may game of themm sporte withall. For some mocked them to scorne, other drewe lottes, and played awaytheir parte of the spoyles, as if they had already wonne the fielde: and enery one of the kinges and Captaines came and offered them selves to Tigranes, and besought him everie man forhim felfe, that he would geue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would please him to fit by in some place to see the sporte. Tigranes then, bicause he would shewe that he could be as pleafaunt as the rest, spake a thing knowen to euery man. If they come as Ambassadors, quod he, they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but fewe. And thus they played youn the ROMANES, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time : but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the fielde, and put them in a der of battel. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on thother fide of the river towards the East, and by chaunce the streame of the river turned sodainly towardes the West, where there was a better ford to passe ouer. Wherfore Lucullus marching with his army by the rivers fide, following the streame to meete with some forde, hasting to ger ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and fayd vnto him, laughing. Doeft thouses Taxiles, those goodly Romane legyons, whom thou praisest to be men so inuincible; howe they flie away now? Taxiles aunswered the king againe. I would your good fortune (O king) might worke some miraclethis day: for dourlesse it were a straunge thing that the ROMANES should sie. They are not wont to weare their braue cotes and furniture vppon their armor. when they meane onely but to marche in the fieldes: neither doe they carie their shieldes and targets vncased, nor their burganets bare on their heades, as they doe at this present, having throwen away their leather cases and coueringes. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we fee so bright and glistering in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they marche towardes vs. Taxiles had no sooner spoken these wordes, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enfigne bearer turne fodainly that carried the first Eagle, & the bands F tooke their places to passe the river in order of battell. Then Tigranes secretly comen to him felfe, as out of dronkennes: cried out alowde twife, or thrife, come they then to vs? But then

A was there no finall four e and tumule, to put fuch a world of people into hattell. The king Tigrate him felfe yndertooke to leade the midle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the APIABENIA NS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the most patte The ordering of the complete armed men, who made the first front of all the battell, But as Lucallus was rea- of Tigrames dyto paffe the river, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vitto him, to with him to rake heede that he fought not that day, bicause it was one of those which the ROMANES thought unfortunate; and call them Atri, to fay, blacke: for upon one of those dayes, one Co- Artiblacke or niewas ouerthrowen in a fet battell with all his army by the CIMBRES, But Lucultus gave the inforunaise aprety aunswere againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (layd daye. helfor the ROMANES. It was the fixteenth day of the moneth of October. And lo with thole wordes encoraging his men, passed ouer the river, and went him selfe the foremost man, and marched directly towardes his enemy, armed with an anima of ficele, made with scalloppe, Luculius barhelles, thining like the funne, & vpon that an arming coate fringed tound about, holding his, tell with Tiword drawen in his hand: to let his men understand, that they must sodainly joyne with their Luculus arenemies, and fight at the fwordes pointe, that were not acquainted to fight but a farre of with mor. hotte and flinges, and that he would fo quickely winne the distaunce of grounde they had to marche ere they could ioyne, that they should have no leasure to shoote. And furthermore. perceiuing that the strength of their men of armes (wherof they made so great accompt) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and quen, and the way vp the hill not passing foure furlonges trauaill, and not very hard nor steepe to clime: he sent thither Coettaine horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commaunded them to geue a charge on the flancke to diforder them, & affay to cut their launces, with their swordes. For all the strength of these men of armes consisteth in their launces, and they can do nothing for them selves, nor against their enemies, they are so heavely armed and lodens foasit feemeth they are locked up in their armor, as in an iron prison. And he him selte therewithall taking two enfignes of footemen, stroue also to gaine the toppe of the hill, his fouldiersfollowing him hard at the heeles with a notable corage, bicause they saw him the formost mantrauailing a foote, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten up to the toppe, he stayed a litle in the highest place he could finde, and then cried out with a lowd voyce: oh companions, the victory is ours. And as he spake those wordes, he ledde them ap gainst these men of armes, commaunding them they should not medle with throwing of their dartes, but taking their swordes in their handes they should strike at their thighes and legges. bicause they have no other partes of their bodies naked. How beit there was no neede of such fight, for they taried not the ROMANES, but with great crying out turned their horse heades immediatly, and ranne cowardly (them selues and their horses, heavie armed as they were) through the middest of the bandes of their footemen, before they had striken a stroke. And Luculus fathus were fo many thowfandes of men broken without any stroke striken, or any man hurt, or of Tigranu. one droppe of blood seene to be spilt. But the great slaughter was, when they beganne to sie, or (to fay better) when they thought to flie : for they could not flie, they ranne fo one apon anothers necke by reason of the maruelous length and bredth of their battells. Tigranes amongest the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, & seeing his sonne running the fame fortune, flying as him felfe did, tooke of his diadeame or royall bande from Tigrames his head, and gaue it him weeping, commaunding him to faue him felfe as well as he could by flight. some other way. But the young prince durst not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his deameraken trusty servauntes to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: so that a- by Lucullus. mongest the other spoyle and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes diadeame. It is thought that there were flaine arthis ouerthrow, aboue a hundred thowland footemen, and very few of all the horsemen saued. On the ROMANES side, there were about a hundred hurt, and five slaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a treatise he made of the gods, wryteth that the funne neuer faw the like overthrowe. And Strabo an other Philosopher in a certaine Fabridgement he made of stories sayd, that the ROMANES were ashamed, and laughed at them selves that they had drawen their swordes against such dastardly saues. And Titus Linius declareth alforthat the Romans were never in any battell with fo small a number of fighting

Wherefore the oldest and before perienced Captaines of the ROMANES did highly commende Lucullus, bicause he had one cometwo of the greatest & most mighty Princes of the world, by two fundry corrary means the one by tract and delay, and the other by fpede and fwiftnes. For he vndermyned and end fumed Mithridates, by holding backe, & delaying, at that time when all his stregth was whale and to the contrary he deltroyed Tigranes with great speede and haste. And thus did he that which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vied delay of time to execute, and vallianterns. dition to winne the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battel, thinking still that Lucullus had vsed his wonted policy, to delay and gene backe always and therefore he came by small iorneys vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the first with a fewe of the Armenians that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed be straight mistrusted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them nakeds. fore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to fecke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, for faken of his men, and in very poore estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduerfity with that pride and difdaine he had vied him before in his miferie: but lighted of his horse, to bewaile with him their common missfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a kings court that followed him to ferue him, comforting him, & exhorting him to place vo his hart againe, and to be coragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied a freshethe whole force & power they could from all the partes of their dominions. In the meane feafor there fell out great fedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, between the GRECIANS and there barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would have yeelded up the towne into Luille Lucullus tooke hands. Whereupon, Lucullus geuing an affault to the city at that very inftant, wanne it. & fee-Tigranocerra. fed yoon the kings treasure there, leaving all the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which

besides all other riches, there was eight thowsand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoile that was won ap in the enemies, eight hudred Drachmas vnto euer fouldier. And vnderstanding that there were divers musicians, common players, minstrels, and fuch kinde of people meete for feaftes and sporte, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all partes, to dedicate the Theater he had made in his city:he caused all the to serve at the spores and feastes of this victory. After the solempnization whereof, he sent the GRECIANS home againe vnto their contry, and gaue them money to defraye their charges by the way, and then barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their native contries. And so it fortuned, that by the desolation and destruction of a city for faken, many others were builts gaine, and stored with people: bicause those cities had thereby recourred their naturallinhabitants againe, who euer after did loue & honor Lucullus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also, according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iustice, and of clemencie: then that that came by force of marface and cit- shall proves & cheualty. For in deedes of armes, he fayd his army partly deserved praise, and fortune also caried the best parte away : but the praise of the other, were onely due vnto him felfe. Whereby he shewed the valor of an excellent good man, well raught and trained win vertue: and so reaped the frute of his worthy deserts. For by those good partes, he wannethe B hartes of the barbarous people in such force, that the kinges of the ARABIANS came of good will to put them selues and their goods into his hands. So did the nation of the SOPHEN IANS alfo yeld them felues vnto him. The GORDIENIANS in like maner, they liked Lucullus fo well, that they would willingly have for faken their cities, houses & contry, to follow him with their wines & children vpon this occasion, Zarbienus king of these Gordienians, as we have recited before, had privily entred amity with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no lenger away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practife was bewrayed vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife, & children to death, before the ROMANES maine army came into the contry of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but paffing through his realme, gauehim very royall funeralles. For having heaped vp a huge pyle of wodde, sumptuously ser out with F cloth of gold and filuer, & other rich spoiles of Tigranes: he him selfe in person, would needes fet it a fire, and made the funerall effutions and accustomed sprincklinges at burialles, with his

Zarbienus king of the flaine by TiA frendes and kinsemen, doing him this honor, as to call him frend and confederate of the Ros ways people, & appointed also a great summe of money besides to erect a sumpruous tombe for him. For they found great store of gold and filuer in the kinges castell, and there was blenry of prouision also of three hundred thow sand but hells of wheate: the which did enriche his fouldiers marueloufly, and made Lucullus to be wondered at, that havinge received not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at Rome, he had not with standing made the warre entermine it felfe. About the felf same time also, the king of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors vnwhim to offer him his frendshippe and allyance : which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambassadors fro him also of acceptation, who made reporteto Lucullus at their returne that theking of the PARTHIANS stoode doubtfull how to resolve which parte he should take, and that fecretly he fent vnto Tigranes, to aske the realme of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aide him against the ROMANES, Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leave Tigranes and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied & ouercome. Walitle to proue the force & power of the PARTHIANS by making warres upon the thinking irgreat honor vnto him, if he might discomfit and ouerthrow three so mighty kings one after another, like a valliant conqueror that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had naffed through the contries of three of the greatest Princes vndet the sunne, alwayes a conqueror, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sernative and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realine of Pontvs, that they should repayie to him with all speede with the bandes they had under their charge, for that he was determi-Ched to departe out of the contry of GORDIENA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his Lucultus pripurpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenauntes that had many times before sounde their paresh to goe purpose affected by occasion. For its Electromagnation and Mary and Society of the foundation of the f homakes & incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by Lucidius foulany compulsion or perswasions they could vie: but contrarily they cryed out, and tolde them dies fall to plainly, that they would no lenger tary where they were, but would goe home to their contry. and leave the realme of Pontvs without gard or garrison at all. And further, that worst of all was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnes to his fouldiers there, to mutiny in such forte, having good will and disposition thereunto of themselves before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with finenes, were become Full purses, 60 so dull and lasie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnes of warres, but defired to live in eafermaketh all idlenes and ease. Neuertheles, he came downe into the valley, and at two or three skirmishes ouerthrew E the Armenian s, that ventered to abide his comming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley. and destroyed the whole contry, without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the provision,

But bicause they had so ofte bene discomfitted, they would no more stirre, nor once mone 4gainst him. Lucullus perceiving that, in the end raised his campe, & went and layed siege vnto Incultus be-ARTAXATA the chiefe city of the kingdom of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull fiegeth Areawines & young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard an other battell, then fuffer that city to be loft. It is fayd that Hanniball of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochys was ouer- nia. throwen in battell by the ROMANES) went vnto king Artaxes, whom he taught many necessa-

went with all his army to follow the ROMANES, and the fourth day came and camped hardhe them: infomuch as there was but the river of Arfanias between them, which the ROMANIA of necessitie must passe ouer to goe to ARTAXATA. Lucullus havinge first sacrificed vuto the goddes, affuring him selfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his handes: made his armie passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelve cohortes in the fronte, and the other behinde, fearing least the enemies having a great number of men of armes shoulde environne them? their backes. They had against them also the MARDIAN bow men a horse backe, and the Iss. RTANS with their lances, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best food diers he had in pay and yet for all that they did no notable feruice. For when they had skirming shed but a little with the horsemen of the ROMANES, they durst not tarie the legyonaries or footebands that came behinde them, but dispersed them selues, some slying one way, some an other, which intifed the ROMANE horiemen to follow the chase. But when the men of arms that were about Tigranes person, sawe the horsemen so scattered abroade, they began straight to breake vpon the footemen. Lucullus feeing the great multitude of them, and how paffingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat affrayed thereof: sent in hast to call in his o horsemen that followed the chase, and in the meane time him selfe marched foremost, against these Lordes and Satrapes, which were in the fronte before him with all the nobility of their hoaft, whom he put in fuch a feare, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kinges ranged in battell one hard by an other, how beit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of Ponty s, who had not the hart so much as to abide the cries of the Romanes. The chase was very long; forit continued all night vntill fuch time as the Romanes were wearied with killing, taking of prifoners, and packing vp of all kindes of fpoyles. Titus Liuius fayeth, that there were flaine moe men in the first battell: but greater personages in the seconde, and the chiefest of the enemies her Tigranes were all taken. After this battell Lucullus hart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to 1 goe further into the contry, even vtterly to destroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that feefon haue thought) there fell out so great a cold, that for the most part it did nothing but snow. and if the element did any thing cleere, then frose it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the rivers were so extreamely congealed with ife. And there could no man passe over by forde: for they did not so soone enter, but the ise brake, and cut the vaines & sinewes of the horse legges a sunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore, the contrybeing full of trees, woddes and forrestes, and the wayes very narrowe, not being able to passely the fieldes, they were through wet with fnow that fell vpon them: & when they came to their lodging, then it was worfe, for there were they constrained to lye in fost & moyst places. And E therefore the fouldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refused to goesny further. And first they sent their Collonells and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leane of this iorney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in trowpes, and in the night time beganne to murmure and groyne in their tents (which is a certaine figne and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a minde to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus vsed all gentle perswasions to winne them with pacience to abide this iorney, at the least, till time they might take the citie of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to thende they might there destroy the worke and memory of the greatest enemy that euer the Romanes had in this world, meaning The count of Hanniball, But when he faw all this would not prevaile, he brought them backe againe, & pal-Mygdonia.

A thit city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes owne brother but for experiece in engines of battery, and for fufficiencie and skill in fuch matters, there was Callimachus alfo, he that fo marucloufly troubled Lucullus before at the fiege of the city of Amis, vs. Lucullus placing his campe before this city, befieged the same by all such meanes as might enforce it, and that so valliantly, that in very shorte time he tooke it by affault. And as for Gouras, who submitted him Lucullus mas felic to Lucullus mercie, he was very curteoully intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not by affault. once heare him speake, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would saue his life he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but him felfe onely. But Turallus commaunded them to bring him with gyues to receive the punishment he had justly described, for setting the city of AMISVS a fire, and taking from him the meane to showe the Collimanter R GRECIANS his goodnesse, affection and liberality towardes them. Vntill this present time, it did feithe cimight be truely fayd, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterprises afre. and affayres: but from that time forwards, it was quickely feene that the fauorable blaft of for- Thalteracion mefailed him, he did all his things with fo great payne, and all that he did fell out contrarie of Luculius vito him, and to very ill purpose. In deede he did euer thew the valiancy, pacience, and great good fortune: corage that should be in a valliant Generall, or Lieutenaunt of an armie. But his exployts and doinges had neuer after that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to have: but to the contrary, he was like to have loft all that he had wonne before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose, But the worst was, that they make him selfe thouly author of all these euills, bicause he could Luciding confe C not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his fouldiers: thinking that of all his mifwhatfoeuer a Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them fortune. he hath under his charge, is to dishonor him felfe, and to gene cause unto his souldiers to defoile his authoritie. But that which made most against him was this: that he gave no estimacion to gentlemen, and men of like quality to him felfe, but diffained them, and thought them Lucullus vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faultes and impersections, but o- faulte. therwise that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes & good condicions that could be posfibit wished for, or desired. For he was a talle gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wise Lucillist verand discreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encorage his fouldiers in warre. Saluft wryteth of him, that his fouldiers began to millike with him, even from the first entry into these warres, bicause he made them lye why Lucullus our two winters together in the field, one after an other: the one before the city of Cizicys, fouldien mifand the other before the city of Amisvs. And even as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them. For either they lay in their enemies contry, or elfe if they lay in their frendes, yet he made them campe abroade in the field, and shrowd them selves in their tentes: Lucullus army for Lucullus neuer entred with his army into any city or confederate towne of GRECE. Now eur lay in the if the fouldiers of them felues misliked Lucallus, the consellers at Rome that were his enemies, and famour, and enuied his prosperity and glory, gave them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they cotinually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this warrein length, purposely bicause he would alwayes have occasion to rule, & meanes to get, having in E hishands in maner all Cilicia, Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontys, Ar-MENI A, and all the provinces and regions as farre as to the river of Phasis; and yet he had not Phasis it. long before spoyled the Princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sack and spoyle, and not to destroy & ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintim, one of the Prætors, that spake these wordes. It was he also that most moved the people to take order that Lucullus should be called home, &other sent to succeede him in the charge & gouernmet of the contries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane, it was also ordained: that divers which were vnder his charge, should be dispersed with all for their othes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But befides those & such like great causes, there was yet an other more daungerous plague, & that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, pasfing all the other enills being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, Publius Clo and a harebrainde man. He was Lucullus wives brother, and she was so light of her body, that dies a micket Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in """. BBB iii

Lucullus campe, caried not that estimacion and credit he thought him selfe worthy of. Forbit A tooke him felfe equall with the best, and would needes have bene holden for chiefe: whenh deede there were many of farre better defert, he being noted both for a vitious and ill dispose person. Whereupon he beganne for spight to suborne the bandes called FIMBRIANS, and ftirre them vp against Lucullus, sowing sweete and pleasaunt wordes amongest the souldier. which being wonted therunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Finding had procured to kill the Confull Flacew, and choose him in his steede for their Captaine. Bu reason whereof they gaue good care to Clodius words, and called him a noble Captaine, and louer of fouldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pittied them for that they should neuer see an end of their great paynes and warres, but should miserably confume their dayes in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and sometime with any ther: and that they wandered through all the contries of the world, receiving no worthing ward of fo long and painfull feruice, seruing only to gard Lucullus cartes & camells loden with plate and veffell of golde, and filuer, and other pretious stones. Where the souldiers that had ferued vnder Pomper, tooke nowe their ease at home in their contry with their wives and chik dren, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly fayer cities, as rich burgefes and wealthy citzens: and yet they had not driven Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into defert places vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of Asia, but only made a line warre in Spayne against those that were banished, & in ITALIB against fugitive slaves, Shall we then favd he, cary harnesse on our backes all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntil this present, reserve our selves, our bodies & lives for that noble Cape (taine, who esteemeth the greatest honor and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his fooldiers rich that serue vnder him? Lucullus army was so seduced and corrupted, with these musinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no lenger sollow him, neither against Tieranes, nor against Mithridates: who went presently out of Armenia into his realment PONTVS, and beganne to conquer it againe, whilest the ROMANE souldiers mutining against their General, remained idle in the province of Go RDIENA, excusing them selves by the winter season, & tarying vntill Pompey or some other Captaine should quickely come to raise the fiege, and fucceede Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they understoode that Mithridates had ouerthrowen Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenaunts, and that he went against Sornatius & Tris-Mithridates rius: they were then ashamed of them selues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus, But D victory of Lu-Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neere, made hast to winne the victory. as if it had bene cocke fure before Lucullus came : and was him felfe ouerthrowen in a great Mithridases battell, where some say there dyed aboue seuen thowsande Romanes, amongest the which Triarine Luwere a hundred and fifty centurions, & foure and twenty Captaines or Collonells of a thorfand men a peece, and yet besides, Mithridates tooke their campe also. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the fouldiers fought in their angerby all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he prooued fundrie meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once sturre abroade, bicause he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereuppon he determined againe to goe against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he joyned forces to E The Fimbrian gether. But as he was in his iorney towardes him, the FIMBRIAN bandes beganne torebella finding for new, and would not follow his enfignes, faying, and alleaging of them felues, that by decree of the people they had leave to departe, and were discharged from their othe: and surthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to commaund them, confidering that the government of the prouinces which he had, was genen vnto others. Lucullus perceining this, did so humble him felfe vnto them, supposing that way to winne them, as there was no kinde of vncomely humility but he submitted him selfe vnto it: insomuch as he went into their tentes to pray and intreate them one after an other, with water in his eyes, and with so great lowlinesse, as enemo shake handes with them. But they fiercely rejected all his curtefies and faver intreaties, casting their pennylesse purses before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, since he had with the spoile of them all so well enriched him selfe alone. Neuerthelesse, at the intercesfion and earnest request of the other soldiers, these FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to pro-

A milk that they would yet tary all that former, to that if no main the meane time offred them. The Fimbridia bartell at the ende of the tearme, they might go where they would. Lucalless was forced to accenthis condicion, or elfe to remaine alone, & confequently to forfake the contry of the bar-mer, apon caharous people. With much a do thus he kept them together, but in fach forte, as he durft no dision to demore venter to compell them to come to battell, contenting him felfe that they were willing former wat onely to flay with him, being forced to fuffer Tigranes in the meane time to deltroy and over done. runne the contry of CAPPADOCIA, & Mithridates also to bragge againe, of whom he had beforewrytten to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: infomuch as there came commillioners & deputies from Rome by his owne procurement, to order the state of the realine of Pont vs with him, as of a kingdom already wonne to the Roman's Empire. But whe they were comen, they found him not mafter of him felfe, & that his owne fouldiers flowted him. and did him all the spight and iniury they could. For they were so vnruly towardes their Capmine and did fo much disdaine him, that when the end of the sommer was come, they armed them felues with armor and weapon, and drawing out their fwordes in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the fielde: and after they had made the novie anderves accustomed when they joyned battel, and made as though they fought, hurling and fwinging their fwords in the ayer, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promifed Lucullus to tary. On thother fide Pompey had wrytten vnto theother fouldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him : for through the peoples fa- Pompey, In-Generall in Lucullus place. Which much misliked the Senate and nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to have a successor sent, not to succeede him in troubles and daungers, but in honor and glory of triumphe. And that they should compell him not onely to reime vp the office of a Generall to an other, but (for the good fernice he long time had done) thereward of his honor due for the fame; and this also more milliked them, that were then about him. That so soone as Pompey was arrived in Asia, he tooke all power & authority from Initalies offe-Lucullus, to punishe or reward any man, for good or ill service done to the common wealth in by Pompey. those warres, & did moreouer prohibite by publicke bills fet vp in euery common place, that they should no more repayre vnto him, nor obey ought, that he, or any of the ten comissioners lentro dispole of the state of the provinces wonne by him, should commaund or ordaine; and bicause Pompey came with a greater power and army then his, he was in some seare of him. Their frends thought good neuertheleffe they should meete together: and so they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at their first meeting they faluted ech other very cur- Lucullus and teoully, rejoycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elderman, but Pomper of greater dignity, bicause he had bene Generall of the Romane people in many warres, & had already triumphed twife. The bundells of roddes which the fergeaunts caried before them, were wreathed about with lawrell braunches for the victories they had both atchieued: but Pompeys bundells were withered away, bicause they had comen a longe iorney through hotte and drye contries. Lucullus officers feeing theirs withered, curteoufly gaue them of theirs fresh and new gathered: which Pompeys frendes tooke for a figne of good lucke. For to fay truely, the thinges that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cause of the honor that Pompey afterwardes wanne. How beit in the end for all their talke, they were no whit the better frendes: but departed thone from thother more straunge then they met. For Millikinges Pompey by a plaine edict, brake, reuoked, and difanulled all Lucullus ordinaunces, and taking bein ene from him all his other fouldiers, left him but only fixtene hundred to accopany his triumphe, Lucallus. and yet they followed him with vnwilling mindes: fuch was Lucullus imperfection & mayme. either by nature, or frowardnes of fortune, that he lacked the chiefest thing a Generall should haue, which was, to be beloued of his fouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, a- Lucullus me mongest many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimity, wisedom, judgement, & justice: beloved of his theriuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermost confines of the Empire of Rome on Asia F side, but it had exteded as farre as the sea Hyrcane, yea even vnto thutmost parte of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lye beyonde that, fauing the contrie of PARTHIA, which then was not so great nor stronge, as it appeared afterwardes in

lowed eight mules loden with golden beddes, and fixe and fifty other mules that caried film bullion, & a hundred & feuen other moyles that caried filuer coyne, amounting to the fumme of accompt caried also, wherein were particularly wrytten the summes of mony which Lucal lus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre against pyrates on the sea, & vnto thetreaforers and high treasors, to put into the sparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwardes in an article by it selfe, that he had genen nyne hundred and fifty Drachmas meuery fouldier by the polle. After the shewe of this triumphe was ended, he made a general feast, in the which he feasted all the city and villages thereabouts, which the ROMANES call Lucullus for-Vicos. And afterwardes for sooke his wife Clodia for her vnchast and wanton life, and maried Saketh Clodia Seruilia Catoes fifter: howbeit he wanne nothing by thexchaunge, for he fped as euill with the and marieth seconde, as he did with the first. For, fauing that she was not flaundred with thincest other Scruilia Catoes fifter, as owne brethren, otherwise she was as dishonest and vnchast as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers sake, but at the length grew weary of her, and put her away as hehad Clodia. done Clodia. Nowe when he had filled the Senate with a maruelous hope and expectation of

Crassiu time: nor so ioyned and knit together, but (what through civill diffentions amongs. them at home, and forrein warres of their neighbors abroade) was so weake, that with difficulty they could defend themselves from the Armenians, that continually harried the out of their skinnes. But to take thinges rightly as they be in deede, me thinkes that I was did more hurt vnto his contry by other, then he did benefit the same by him selfe. Forther kens of triumphe and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA fo neere vnto the PARTHIAM the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had facked and spoyled, the great treasure that he brought to Rome, and the Diadeame also of Tigranes, which was shewedin triumphe as a prisoner with the rest: moued Crassius with such a maruelous desire to passes to Asia, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an affured spoyle, and a purse. fed pray vnto all those that would come to take them. But Crassus farre otherwise, finding time felfe galled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that is cullus had not so much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a coward people, as he had done through his wifedom and valliantnes. But that shalbe seene hereafter Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to Rome, found first of all his brother Marcus 25. cused by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of treasorer, in Syllaes time and by his commaundement, whereof he was cleared by sentence of the judges. But Man miss of spight turned his anger against Lucullus selfe, stirring up the people against him, and letting them vnderstand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much parte of the treasure. which should have comen to the common wealth, and that to worke his feate the better, had prolonged these warres as he did: wherefore he perswaded them flatly to deny him the honore of his triumphe. And truely Lucullus was in great daunger to haue lost it vtterly: but that the noble men of the city, and they that were of greatest authority, intermedled them selues with the tribes when they came to passe it by voyces of the people, whome they intreated so much through fute and perswasion, that in the end, with much a doe, the people suffred him to enter the city in triumphe. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, not terrible nor troublesome for the long shewe or fight thereof, nor for the multitude of thinges that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For he caused the showe place (which they call Circus Flaminius at Rome) to be fet out and furnished chiefly with armor and weapons of the enemies to a maruelous number: and with the kinges engynes and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleasant fight to behold. And in this show, there had been been a supported by the support of the was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, tenne cartes of warre armed with fythes that passed by, and three score of the chiefest frendes and Captaines of the two kings that were led prisoners through the city. And there were also drawen after them, a hundred and tenne gallies all armed in the prooues with strong spurres of copper, and a statue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, fixe foote high, with a rich target fet with pretious stones, Besides all that, there were twenty cubberds as full of filuer plate as could be, and thirty cubberds full also of golden vessell, armor and coyne of gold, caried vpon mens shoulders. After themsolof two hundred three score and tennethows and Sestertios. Furthermore, there were books E

A hint (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withfrande Pompeys ryranny anil withold and maintaine the authority of the nobility and Senate against the people, for that hothsmoble deedes he had atchieued fo great fame and reputacion) he fodainly gaue ouer all Limitian geme in that a very set of the common wealth: either bicaufe he fawe it to beft, being a hard were set of the common wealth: Magnow to kepe it from ruine: or else (asother sayd) for that he felt him selfe sufficiently furwith honor and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to line quietly all wealth whitehic, after fo great paynes, trauailes and troubles, the end whereof fell not our ouer foranately. And furely forme were of his minde, and liked this great channge of his maruelous well hicause he did not as Marine did, neither happened on the ill successe and end that Ma winhad. pallime: as if to line pleafauntly, & delicatly did not worse become his age, then to comaund marray or to goueme thaffayres of a common weale. And for my parte, reading Lucullus lifes methinkes that I read an auncient comedy, the beginning wherof is tedious, & the latter end jowfull. For at the beginning of his life, you finde notable exployts done by him in warres, and great good government also in peace: but in the end they all turned into feasts, and banckers. and lacking litle of maskes and mommeries, dauncing with torches, and all other fitch delights fitte for young men. For I bring within the compasse and reckoning of his fine he's and Luculius bailphasures, his sumptuous buildinges, his stately walles and galleries, his hotte houses and pheasures. floues, his tables and pictures, his statues also: and the great workmanshippe and curiofitie he had besides of all other cartes by him, gotten together out of all partes to his infinite charge, abusing therein the world of goodes and treasure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwise. Infomuch, that notwithstanding excelle and superfluity hath ener since increased until this present time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors haue. Lucullus gar-And therfore Tubero the Stoike Philosopher, having seene these stately works which Lucultus dens of great had caused to be made neere vnto NAPLES, by the sea side, (where there are mountaines cut estimacion. through light as day, and hanged upon vawtes) and great ditches call by force to make the feat palle and runne through his houses, to keepe fishe therein, and lodginges also that he built in Lucullus cal-E the sea it selfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gownman, as if he would have sayd, Xerxes the led Xerxes ROMANE. For euen so did Xerxes in olde time cause the mountaine Atho to be cut in funder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his shippes through. He had also many other Xerxes en pleafaunt places within the territories of Rome, neete vnto Thy scy white there were through the great large halles fet upon tarraffes to fee rounde about farre of in the day time! And Pompey the on made a houses accordinge to the season? An other time there was a Prætor of Rome, that makinge playes to shewe the people pastime, sent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set forth his players: Lucullus made him auniwer, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demaunding of him, how many he should neede the other aunfwered, that a hundred would ferue his turne. Whereupon Lucultus told him againe, he would going thither formime to fee him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a marge channell for bus fayer formmer house, but notto be dwelt in, the winter featon. Lucullus laughing, answered his shopes u him: doe ye thinke me to have leffe wit and reason then storkes or cranes, that Francos shift furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therefore the Poet Horace waying this story, addeth to a notable exclamation against superfluity, saying: that men thinks the poore house, where there is no more riches then necessary, and where there is not more than appeareth in fight, and that the master knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinaries. uice at his borde, not only in that his beddes whereon he fedde, were couered with righes. pettes of purple, and him selfe served in gold and silver vessell set with pretious stones settle there was dauncing, mulicke, playes, and other fuch like pattimes of ordinary but also forther he was continually ferued with all fortes of fine dainty diffies, with workes of paltry, bands. rolly or exciffen meats ting dishes, and frute curiously wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered collemments at of men of simple vnderstanding and meane condicion. Therefore was Pompey maruelous esteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Phisting by in sommer, but at Lucullus house where they brought them up all the yeare through; he would in no wife they should aske any of him, but fayd vnto his Phistitian. What if Land were not genen to pleasure: could not Pompey line? And so willed them to get him some other fuch thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus frend & kinseman both, and vet he so much misliked his maner of living and ordinary expence: that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate(out of time, and to no purpose) touching

meane dyet, sobriety, & temperaturce of life: Cato could no lenger abide him, but rose ypane fayd vnto him.What, wilt thou not leaue babbling to vs all day: thou that art riche as Craffe. Carrer faying that linest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them : neuerthelesse it is certaine, by the notable sayings they have gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to live so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some wryte that he feasted certaine GRECIANS many dayes together in his house that were come our of GRECE to ROME: and that they being men brought up with the sobries and simplicity of GRECE, after they had bene feasted there divers times, were ashamed & to fused to goe thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made them this great chere for their owne fakes, Lucullus hearing of it, told them:my Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that. In deede I must needes graunt that there is somewhat more then ordinary, to welcome you with all: but I tell you truly, the most pane is for Lucullus sake. An other time when he supped all alone, and his men had layed but onen bord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward to know why he was serued so: the steward aunswered him. My Lord, bicause I sawe you sende for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What, sayd he againe: knewell not thou that Lucullus (hould suppe to night with him selfe? In fine, Lucullus fare was comonly knowenthrough Rome, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble housekeping, Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place feeing him at pleasure: (for Cicero was Lucullus very good frend, and Pompey allo: and though there was some iarre between them for matters of warres, he did not let for that to come vnto him, and to speake gently one to an other) and Cicero after he had faluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, sayd he, with all my E hart: I pray you come to me. Well then, fayd Cicero, Pompey and I will come and suppe with you to night, with codicion that you prouide no more then your ordinary. Lucullus told them againe, they should then fare but badly, and therfore it were better they taried till to morrow, But they would none of that, no nor fuffer him to speake with his men, for feare he should comaund them, to prouide somewhat more then for him selfe. Neuerthelesse, at his desire, they fuffered him onely in their presence alowde to tell one of his men, that he would suppe that night in Apollo: (for fo was one of his most stately and sumpteous halles of his house called) and with that word only hefinely deceived them both, and they never found him. For every halle had his certaine fumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery supper pointed every they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and service for the same. So that when his lethell bus creen uauntes had their watche worde but in what halle he would suppe, they knewe straight what charge he would be at for his supper, & what orders should be observed therin, Now Luculin

Registerwas to spende when he made any feast in the hall of double, fifty thowsand pence, and What Lividme let day the fupper was prepared according to that value: infomuch as Pompey maruewatered it could be possible that a supper of so exceeding great charge could be so sodainly peptied: Infuch thinges therefore did Luculius lauithly andriotoully spendihis goodes, like have indeede gotten of flaues and barbarous people. But that specially which he bestowed with bookes, was very commendable and honest expence. For he had gathered together a Limited the or distinumber of notable histories, the vie wherof was more honor to him, then the hauing of bray. Him For his library was euer open to all comers, and they suffred the GRECIANS to come intellisgeodly tarraffes & fayer walkes, or other pleafaunt places thereabouts concenient to handreafon together, and neuer fhut dore against them: where learned men met common-Blithed oftentimes spent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses, hingvery glad when other matters were dispatched, they had so much leasure as but so goe the And Lucullin felfe would also many times be amonged them, in those tarraffes and oferfant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did ever helpe to dispatch them the had any busines with him, and graunted the thing they requested of him. To conclude, his higher was a common receite for all them that came from GRECE to ROME. He loued all muse of Philosophy, and refused no sect of the same. But from his youth vpward, he ever lo- Lucultus lomile efteemed best the Academicke sect, not that which they call the new Academicke wed Philoso-(although it florithed at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made fuch estimainitiof) but the old ACADEMICKE, which the Philosopher Antiochus of the city of Asca- Antiochus of 1000 did defende and maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rethoritian and well spoken, some loquent rethoritian whom Lucullus fought to win by all meanes to make him his frende, and to have him in house risian. withhim: bicause he might inuey against Philoes hearers and followers, whose scholler Cicero among the rest was, that wrote a notable booke against this olde ACADEMICKE sect. And in the same he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old ACADEMICKES: who hold, The opinion mataman may certainly know, and comprehend something, and called that Catalepsin: but of the Acade-Charodefended the contrary. The booke is intituled Lucullus : for they were (as we have reharled before) very good frendes, and had both one selfe defire for gouernment in the commonwealth. For Lucullus did not so withdrawe him selfe from matters of state, that he would nomore medle at all, nor heare speake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition & conremion as a thing of no small daunger, & breeding great reproache and dishonor to Marcus Marcus Craf-Craffmand Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And these two were they that defended the Senate, Sugar Linding. and whom they raised up to withstand Pompeys greatnes, being affrayed of him, after that Lu- gainst Poorcultur had refused the chiefe place of authority. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in the mar- per. ketplace at courtes and common counfells, to pleasure his frendes when they requested him: and would goe to the Senate also, when there was occasion to breake any new practise, or to ouerthrowe Pompeys ambitious policie. For he ouerthrewe all the orders and constitutions Lievallus and that Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kinges, Mithridates and Tigranes: and with Cato against thehelpe of Cato hindered a distribution of money which Pompey had wrytten for to Rome, whereupon Pompey fell in frendshippe, (or to speake Pompey. Emore plainly, in conspiracy) with Crassius and Casar, by whose helpe and affishaunce, he filled crassius, car Rome with armes and fouldiers: and made the people by force to passe and confirme what he force to passe and confirme what he would have done, after he had violently expulled Lucullus and Cato out of the marker place, gainft the Whereat the noble men were much offended, and milliking the great wrong they had offred face. Lucullus & Cato, Pompeys followers suborned a * BRVTIAN, and faid he was taken lying in waite him Lucius tokill Pompey, Wherupon the fayd BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine: Veffins, how but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, saying that he had hyered him to kill beit it may be Pompey. And this was proued more plainly within few dayes after, when they threw the body of this BRVT LAN dead in the middest of the streete, out of the prisone: who they say dyed of him felse with sickenes.

did it, whom after they had fuborned to accuse Lucallus, they flue in this maner. This manual cause why Lucullus did more the before absent him selfe from medling in publicke causes after, when he fawe that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and sound meanes also to com-Cato farre enough of, vnder pretenced colour to fende him with charge into the Ileof C. PRVS: then he gaue vp altogether. Some wryte that a little before his death, he was not pen in his wittes, decaying through age by lide &lide. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos fayth, that have not for age, nor fickenes, that his wittes did alter : but through poyfon which one of his lane had geuen him, whom he had made free, called Callifthenes: who gaue it him, not of any aud intent, but bicause his master should love him the more, supposing that this poyson had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits fo much with this poylon, that Lucullus while heliued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouerfee his goods. Notwithstading this wie. he was dead, he was as much bewayled and lamented of all the people, as if he had dyedinhi best credit, and greatest prosperity. For all the people ranne to honor his funeralls, and his he die was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people would war case have buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla, But bicausean man thought of it before, and also for that things necessary were not easily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus befought the people they would be content his funeralls might be at a towne of his owne, neere vnto the city of Thyseviv M, where his tombe was prepared, and he him selfe lived not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honor, hadnot left him farre behinde him : fo did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had always dearely loued him, he could not then long line, and furnine him.

Othing(in my opinion) made Lucullus more happy, then to dye when E he did, before he fawe the chaunge & alteracion of the comon weale, which the fatall destinies plagued the Romanes with all, with sedition & ciuil warres: and that he dyed in his contry yet enioying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that he was likest vntocimon about all other things: who died whilest the GRECIANS werein good loue and peace with other, and not in broyle of discorde and ciuill warres. In deede Cimon dyed in his campe, being Generall of his contry, at the fiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not withdra-

wen to his home, as one wearied, living idlely, or leading a voluptuous life in feaftes and barkets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphes: but as Plats faid, (when he wisely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiseth perpetuall dronkenes in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that lived well in this life) merily. And truely it is weakenes, to withdraw him felfe from the world, as well in matters of government in neace, as inwarres : and quietly to passe his time instudie, where delight is loyned with honest conremplation. But to finish his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleasure at your other dithuendand moreouer, to grow old by pleafurg and vanity, tolemnifing Fanus feedt all tide reft of his life lafter he hath made such warres & commanded such ampies that me shinkes athing vowerby of an honest Acade Micke, and altogether vnmcere for one profession olds. Xenomate doctrine, but fit rather for a man genen over altogether to Epicurus discipline. There is awonderfull thing to be confidered of in these two men, that the ones wouth was alto bether vitious and reproachfull, and thothers to the contrary, honeft and vertuous But he is the ber-B orthat chaungeth for the better: & that nature is alwayes more commendable, it whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young; then that which by continuance of time betweeth hill the decayeth, and vertue waxern young; there may mine to your fellen means; but they did not both a decayeth, and furthermore, they both grew, rich by one fellen means; but they did not both a decayeth wildows of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow, they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow they want to be a compare the buildones of the wall that flow they want to be a compared to be a compa like we their riches. For it were to no purpose to compare the buildings of the wall that stany deth fouth within the castell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cinew brought this ther; with the fine built chambers, and high railed turrets to gale a farre, & equitonned about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the spoyles of the barbarous neople. Neither is Cimons table also of moderate fare & dyer, but yes open to every managed inparable to Lucullus borde: which was sumptupully furnished, and shewed the greatnes of his Lord. For Cimons bord fed many mouthes dayly with a small charge and Lucullus table exceded in expence, to feede a few, with superfluous dainties. Onlesse they will say, that time caufed this difference between them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leafure to have withdrayen him felfe to quiet in age from government, and armes, he alfo would not have ledde a more sumptuous & diffolite life, geuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did ? For of his ownena, turche loued wine, banckets, and playes, and was also getten to women, as we have told you before, But prosperity, and fortunate successe of thinges doe bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises: that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine defires. And therefore had Lucullus dyed abroade in the warres, whilefthe commaunded armies: there had not bene that living man, how curious foeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faultes, that could have detected him of any reproachefull vice. And thus much for their maner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warress no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by fea as by land. And like as in games of prise and exercises of body which are shewed in GR # CB; they that in one felfeday winne the games at wreftling, and weapons both, are called by a ftraunge cuftome. not conquerours only, but victors also, to honor them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon inlike case having in one selfe day crowned GRECE with two notable markes of triumphe. for two battels he wanne, the one by fea, and the other by lande, deferueth to have fome place cimen to and preferment before other Captaines. And moreover, Lucullus received the authoritie to videoies ob. commaund, of his contry and common wealth: but Cimon gaue his contry both authority. & tained in one ability to commaund, Lucullus found his contry a commaunding people to all their frends and E confederats: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily found his contry marching under an others enfigne, and through his valliantnes did to behave him folfe. that he made his city goe before her confederars, and triumphe ouer her enemies; compelling. Great diffethe Persians by force to gene them the rule by fea, and petfwading the LAGED AMONIANS reme beiness willingly to geue place vnto them by lande. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make him felfe to be beloued of his fouldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, & Cimon esteemed and wondred at, even of the confederates them felues. For Lucullus was for faken of his owne men: and Cimon was

The one by reasonathin death, which cut him of on the fodaine being Generall, and when his affayres prospered bea The other can hardly be exented, that there was not a great fault in him:either in that he could not or bicaufe he would not fatisfie the complaints & griefes of his men, which caufed them so much to hate and missike him. And yet it might be layd also that in this fault he was like ve. to Gimon : who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his comie for the space of tenne yeares, bicause that in tenne yeares space (as Plato sayth) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truely, it seldom times happeneth, that the graue wittered noble inor do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common prophelic cause they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much a as furgeons doe their pacients when they binde up their fores with bandes to cure them For though by that binding they restore & bring to their natural places againe the broken bone gold Singuit or members out of joynt: yet put they the pacient to great paine and griefe. And therforeme thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed, Furthermore, Lucullus wet a great deale further with his army then euer Cimon did. For he was the first Romane Captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, and the river of Tigris with an army. He tooke and burnt almost in fight of both the kinges, the royall cities of Asia, Tigranocerta, Cabira, Sin Ope, and Nise BIS. Towards the north, he went as farre as the river of Phasis: towards the east, into Madia and fourthward, even to the redde fea, and vnto the realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the Roman's Empire. And having overthrowen all the power of these two mighty kinges, her tooke from them all, but their persons only: who fled and hid them selues like wild beastes, in infinite deferts and vnpaffable forreftes. Wherin is eafily difference the difference betwix the doinges of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ourthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRECIANS, & ouerthrew the greatest parte of their army in E G YPT: where Methridates and Tigranes, after Lucullany, ctories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding him felfe altogether pulled downers his knees, and broken by the former battells: durft neuer once only thew his army vnto Porper, out of the strength of his campe, but fled into the realme of BOSPHORVS, where he dved king of Pon-And Tigranes, he went and humbled him felfe on his knees, vnarmed, and without weapon. vnto Pompey and taking his diadeame of from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering him n she realme of for the victories he had won, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason wher-Tigrant king of he scaped good cheape, & thought him selfe happy, when Pompey gaue him only the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the moreworthy Captaine, & stowtest champion, that leaueth his enemy in weake estate for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwardes with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of Persia ouerharried, the pride and fiercenesse of the Persians layed grounde, by many great battells they had lost before vnto Themistocles, king Pausanias, & Leetychides, who had ouerthrowen them: and going now againe to fight a fresh with them, it was an easie thing to ouercome the bodies of those, whose harts were already vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, affailed Tigranes, that had never bene overcome, but bare a marue-E lous lofty minde with him, for the many great battells and conquestes he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betwene those that Cimon ouerthrew, & those that were raunged in battell against Lucullus. So that all thinges weyed and considered, it were hard to judge which of them two proued the worthiest man : for that it seemeth, that the goddes did favor both the one and the other, telling the one what he should doe, and the other what he should not doe. And thus it appeareth by testimonie of the goddes, they were both good men, and that they both obtained

But when it striueth with thinges that are past all chalenge & conrecting, then is it extreame follie and madnes. Sence therefore I may not passe ouer noronic certaine thinges, which Thueydides and Philistus have already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the variety of his successes and the tune did couer. Of Nicias therefore may be fayd that which Arifforle hath wrytten of him: that there were three famous citizens of ATTHENS, very honest men, & which fauored the comuna with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the fonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the fonne of Miles and Theramenes the sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest accompt the he is flowted as a forrenner borne in the Ile of C no s, and chalenged besides for inconstant inresolute in matters of state and gouernment: and inclining somtimes to one faction, some time to an other, he was called Cothurnus, a kinde of buskin indifferently feruing for both legges, and in old time was vied of common players of tragedies. Now being much affrayed of accusers, this timorous manner of h proceeding in the citie, was founde to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good willow the people: and by meanes thereofrose daily more and more, bicause the people commonly feare those that hate them, & aduaunce them that feare them. through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great cloquence ruled the whole state&common wealth of Athens, he needed no counterfeate colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to winne their fauor and good willes: but Nicias lacking that, and having wealthe nough, fought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Clean would entertaine the ATHENIANS with pleasaunt toyes and deuses, and could seede the peoples humorthat E way : Nicias finding him felfeno firman to worke by fuch encounter, crept into the peoples fauor with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with fuch like fumptuousnes, exceeding in cost and pleasaunt sportes, not only all those that had bene before him, but such al fo as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his confecrating vnto the goddesias the image of Pallas in the castell of ATHENS, the gilt being worne of : and the chappell which is vnder the festivall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe prise in Bacchus damfes, & neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, there goeth a report that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth apon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: & being a goodly tall young man, without any heare on his face, the ATHENIANS tooke fuch pleasure to see him so attired, that F they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithall Nicias floods vp, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leave the body of a man in bondage, that

A openly was effeemed as a god: and thereupon foorthwith made this young flane a free man. Men wryte also of certaine sumptuous and deuout acts he did in the He of D B Los, where the daunsers and singers which the cities of GRECE sent thither to singe similes and verses in the honor of Apollo, were wont before to arrive diforderly; and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to fee them, who made them finge straight without any order, and landing in half out of their shippes, they left their apparell, and put on such vestements as they should weare in procession, and their garlands of flowers on their heades, all at one present time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to present the fingers of ATHENS, landed first in the lle of Renta, hard adjoyning to the He of Dalos, with his fingers, his beaftes for facrifice. and with all the rest of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATHENS, vpon measure taken of the channell, between the one and thother Ile set out with nictures and tables, with gilding, with no fegayes and garlandes of triumphe, and with excellent wrought tapiftry; which in the night he fet vp vpon the channell, being not very broade, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his singers to passe ouer apon it singing all the way as they went in his procession so nobly set forth, euen voto the very temple of Apollo. And when the facrifice, the feast, and games that were to be played were finished, he gaue a goodly palmetree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought landes befides that coft him tenne thowfande Drachmas, which he confecrated also vnto the god Putton of the lie? and ordained, that the profittes of the same should be yearely bestowed by the DELIANS. pon an open facrifice and feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and prosperity of Nicias: and so caused it to be wrytten and grauen apon a piller he left in DE LOSA as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offring, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by windes, it fell apon the great image of the Naxans gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremony and act of his, there was a maruelous pompe, & greatshew of popular ambition: neuerthelesse, he that shall consider of his life and actions, may easely perswade him selfe that about all he did it of very pure zeale & denotion. and secondly, to geue pleasure and pastime to the people. Now Nicias being thus timerous of nature, and fearing to gene any little occasion to the Nichat water Orators to accuse him: kept himselfe so warely, that he neither durst eate nor drinke withan man in the city, nor yet put foorth him felfe in companie to talke, or paffe the time amoned them, but altogether anoyded such sportes and pleasures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counsayle house, but still butied him selfe in dispatching causes, from more ning till night, and was euer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of state in hande, then was hevery hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no accesse vnto him, burkept close in his house : and some of his frendes did euer aunswere them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, faying, that he was busie then about affayers of the common wealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, and had him felfe taught him both learning & musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnes and grauety. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they find certaine Poeticall workes at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of menther were sent to dwell in IT ALIE, did build there the citie of THV RIES. Hieron I say did seruchis turne, and holpe him fecretly to inquier what he would viderstande of the Soothsayers, and der of the city gaue out these wordes among the people : that Nicias led too miserable and painefull alife. for the ouergreat care he tooke to serue the common wealth: insomuch, as though he were in his hotte house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his minde ranne still of some matter about the common wealth, and to serue the state, did neglect his owne private affayers : so that he scant beganne to sleepe & take rest, when others commonly had sleept their first sleepe. and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growen crabbed and vncurteous, euen to such as before had bene his familiar frendes. So that, sayd he, he loseth them together with his goodes, and all for seruice of the common wealth: where others grow rich, and win frendes, by the credit they have to be heard of the people, and can make mery among them, E and sporte with the matters of state which they have in their handes. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truely fay that which Agamemnon spake of him selfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Iphigenie in AVLIDE.

In outvoard show of stately pompe all others I exceede. And yet the peoples underling I am in very deede. .

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in some thinges did serue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, & wifer then others, although they yet miftrufted their fufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their corage, by taking their and thority from them: as for proofe the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNVSIAN, and moreover by that they did vnto Paches F (that tooke the Ile of LES BOS) who being brought before the judges in open counfell to gene vp an accompt of his charge, drewe out his fword, and flue him felfe in prefence of them all.

A Nicias I faye, remembring these examples, sought ever to sie from these offices, which were either too great, or too smal, and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke furely. & to yenture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily conie Aure, prospered maruelous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisedom nor vet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the goddes, contented him felfe to leffen his glory, and that onely to anoyde enuver Abbbe enent of thinges falling out even in his time doe fufficiently witnes vnto vs. For the citie of Arbuns having fufteined many great loffes and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, rior had dught to doein any of them. And as touching the plague, the greatest numher layed the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of warres keptithemen that chine purof the contry, within the walles of the citie of ATHENS: and fo by chaunging of averyand their wanted maner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and missornines, was Nicias euer burdened : but contrariwise he being Capraine tooke the He of Cy- Wotable aster THE RA, which the LACED E MONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for figuration to mo left and destroy the contrie of LAGONIA. At this hattell he chaunsed to forget to bury two of his men that were flaine, whose bodies could not be found in gathering vo of the rest: how beit so soone as he heard of it, he caused all his steere ed stay; and some ab Herauld to the enemies, to pray leave to fetche away those two bodies. Whereupon, they then became fory, and repented them much that they had sent away the Ambasfadors of the LACEDEMONIANS which came to them to treate of peace, and that they had (through Cleans procurement) suffred them to departe in that forte without refolucion takens who was against the altogether, only to do Nicias a despite, being his enemy, & did earnestly folicite the matter the LACEDE MONIANS requested. This was the cause why Clean personaded the ATHENIANS, to refuse their offer of peace. But when the people faw that this fiege drewe out in length, and that their campe suffered grieuous wantes and necessities then fell they out with Cleon, and he againe burdened Nicias, faying that through his feare he would let the belieged Spartans escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not have holdenout fo long. The Athenians hearing Clean say so, had more lust to laugha good, then to beleue that he spake: for it was their maner euer to laugh at his anger and folly For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being solenly affembled in counsell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would fay, & having taried long for him: at the lengthle came with a garland on his head, and prayed the affemblie to difmiffe the courte till thener morning: for, quod he, I shall not be at leasure to day, bicause I have sacrificed, and doeses also certaine straungers my frendes that are come to see me. Euen fo Aleibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great chaunge and alteracion: For, it fell out, that after Nicias was ridde of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS agains to peace and quietnes. For when the common wealthbegan to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into wants, through Alcibiades extreame fury of ambition. And thus it beganne. The only peacebreakers chon & Bra- and diffurbers of common quiet generally throughout GRECE, were thefe two persons, fidus the two Cleon and Brasidas: for warre cloked the wickednes of the one, and advanced the valianmes of the other, geuing to either occasion to doe great mischiefe, and also oportunity to worke F many noble exploytes. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by Amphipolis, Nicias straight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the

A ATHENIANS wereno more so hottely genen to the warres, but that both the one & the other had their handes full, & were willing to be quiet: deuised what meanes he might vie to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GRECE also from broyle and mifery of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enion a peaceable and happy life. The riche men, the olde men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearkento peace: and talking prinately also with divers others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being defirous of warres. Whereupon, putting the SPART ANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they fought it: the SPARTANS beleued him, not onely for that they had founde him at other times very foft and curteous, but also bicause he was carefull to see that their prisoners of Sparta, (who had bene taken at the force of Pyle) were R gently intreated, and had made their miferable captivity more tollerable. For to confesse a troth, euery man was certainly perswaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light causes perswaded the GRECIANS to runne headlong into most grieuous calamities : and Nicias on the other side had brought them to become frends, and to forget the great hurtes the one had received D'of the other in former warres. And eue to this present day, that peace is called Nicium, as who Nicius peace. would fay, Nicias peace. The capitulacions of the peace were thus agreed vpon that of either sidethey should alike deliuer up the cities, and landes, which eche had taken from other in time of warres, together with the prisoners also: and that they should first make restitution. whole lot it was to beginne. Nicias (according to Theophrastus reporte) for ready money secrely bought the lot, that the LACED EMONIANS might be the first that should make restin mition. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOBOTIANS that disliked of this peace, sought by the complaintes they made, to renue the warre againe : Nicias then perswaded both the A-THENIANS and LACED & MONIANS, that they should adde for strength vnto their contry the allyance & peace offensiue and desensiue made betwene them, for a more sure knot of frends Eshippe, wherby they might be the better affured the one of the other, and also the more dredfull to their enemies that (hould rebell against them. These thinges went cleane against Alexbisdes minde: who besides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy also unto the Lacan Ball MONIANS, for that they fought to Nicias, and made none accomptof him; but despited him; Herewas thoccasion that caused Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could doe whinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet shortly after, Alcibiader perceiuing that the Athenians liked not fowell of the Laced Emonians, as they did before, and that they thought themselves injuried by the bicause they had lately made league with the Bos o-THINS without their prinity, and had not wholly rendred up the cities of PARACTV M& AM-PRIPOLIS according to the condicions articled betwene them: began then to enlarge and ag-F granate the peoples complaintes, and to make them offended with enery one of them. he departed thence. Where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed but was also in daunger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request & comfell had redeliuered fuch men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For in deede, the pri- n foners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the force of Pyle, were all of the chiefelt houses of Sparta, and their kinsemen and frends were the noblest men of the city. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, fauing that they chose Alie. biades their Captaine, and made league with the Elians, and Mantinians (which hadre Holted from the LACED & MONIANS) and with the ARGIVES alfo: & fent pyrates to the force of Pyle, to spoyle the contry of LACONIA. Vpon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell against into warres. Now when the quarrell and controuerfie was greatest between Nicias and Altibiades, the Oftracismon (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for tenne yeares any such of their citizens as they thoughreither of too great author rity, or that was most enuied for his wealth and substaunce. Alcibiades and Nicias were then E not a litle perplexed, confidering their present daunger, being sure that thone of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiader like & were afrayed of his valliantnes: as we have more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied, befides they misliked his straunge maner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conversant with the people than he was, and compred him too stately: moreouer they hated him also, bicause in many matters he had spokendirectly against the thing the people defired, & had enforced them against their willes to agree to that which was profitable for them selues. In fine to speake more plainly, there fell out great strife betwene the young men that would have warres, and the olde men that coveted peaces fome desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades; but

and of And A Add fofellit out then. For the ATHENIANS being deuided in two fuctions, gave authority to centaine of the most impudent & insolent persones that were in all the city and among them was one Hiperbolus of the towne of Perith vs a man of no haulor nor value, why he should Hyperbolus he bold shut yet one that grew to some credit & power, diffionoring his contry, by the honor ther gave him. Now Hyperbolus thinking him felfe free at that time from any davinger of baminuent, (having rather deserved the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were banihed he should match him well enough that remained behinde: shewed openly? that he was olad of their discorde and variance, and bufily stirred up the people against them both. For this banishment was thought a meete punishment for Thuryandes Aristide, and such like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too greatan honor, & too manifest an occasion of glory to be genen to him, that for his wickedneshad the selfe same punishmet, which was to be inflicted upon the chiefest estates for their

The Ostracie denised was for men of noble fame. And not for variets, vvhose leved life deserued open shame.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man banished with the Ostracismon. For himself was The taking de the laft, as Hipparchus Cho LARGIAN, and nearest kinseman to the tyranne, was the first. Sure way of tenne fortune is a very vincerten thing, & without coceit of reason. For had Nicias franckely put him ment. felfeto the halard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needes hauehappened him: either to haue remained in the city with victory, his aduerfary being banished: or being connict by his banishment to have scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the same he had wonne of a wife Captaine. though he had bene ouercomen. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus wryteth, how Hy-Derbolus not Nicias, was banished through the diffention that fell betweet Phanx and Alcibiades: albeit most wryters agree with that I have told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being comen to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of Sicilia: Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft & ambition. For he, before they were called to counfell, had already through falle furmifes filled the peoples heades with a vaine hope & perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, & the old men also in artificers shoppes, and in their compassed chayers, or halfe circles where they fate talking together, were enery one occupied about drawing the platforme of Sicile, telling the nature of the Sicilian fea, & reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that E Sight should be the end of their warres, but rather the storehouse and armorie for all their munition and martiall provision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquerall AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, even to Hercules pillers. Now all their mindes being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he founde very sewe men of quality to stand by him. For the riche, fearing least the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge, and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though in dedenot contented with all yet would not Nicias leave still to counsell the to the contrary. But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of Sicile, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the Wicias chosen next leffion of the counfell holden in the citie, Nicias role vp againe, to fee if he could turne Captaine for F the people from this iorney with all the protestations he could pushibly make, burdening Al- the wares of

of the Orators that most procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterprise Report foorth, and fayd. It were good that Nicias left of, and fet a fide all these excuses and deple and preferred a decree, that the people shoulde thorowely authorise the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward & execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and he perswaded the people to passe and authorise it. Yet it is sayd that the Priestes objected man thinges to hinder the iorney. But Alesbiades also having suborned certaine soothsyers alle ged in like case some auncient Oracles that sayd, the ATHENIANS should have great home from Sicile: & further had intiled certaine pilgrimes, who fayd they were but newly come from the Oracle of Impiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence, That the Athenia should take all the Syracufans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come they held their peace, least it should seeme they entermeddled to prognosticate enils for affe. ctions fake, feeing that the fignes them felues, which were most plaine and notorious could not remoue them from thenterprise of this iorney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes, and images of Mercurge, which in one night were all to be mangled, fauine one image only called the Hermes of Andocides, which was genen & confectated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGBIDES, and was fet up directly ouer against a citizens house called de. docides. Furthermore, the chaunce that happened by the aulter of the twelue goddes: where a man leaping fodainly vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut of his genitories with stone. And in a temple also in the city of DELPHES, where was a litle image of Mineraco gold, fet apon a palme tree of copper, which the citie of ATHENS had genen of the spoyles wonne of the MEDES. Apon that palme tree fate certaine crowes many dayes together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the frute of it which was all of golde, vntill they made the fame to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS fayd, that the DELPHIANS (whom the Symevs ans had fubdued) had finely fained this deuise. There was a prophecy also that commaisded them to bring one of Mineruses Nunnes to ATHENS, that was in the city of CLAZOME-NES. So they fent for this Nunne called Hefychia, which is, rest: & it seemeth it was that which the goddes by this prophecy did counsell them vnto, that for that time they should be quiet I Meton the Astronomer having charge in the army leavied for the warre of Sicile, being afrayed of this prophecie, or otherwife milliking the celeftiall fignes, and fucceffe of the iorney : fained him felfe mad, and fet his house a fire. Others say he counterfeated not madnes, but did one night in deede fet his house a fire, and that the next morning looking ruefully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitiefull state, to sue to the people, that in cosideration of his great misfortune happened him, they would discharge his sonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gallieat his owne coft, and ready to make fayle. Moreouer, the familiar spirite of wise Socrates that did vie to tell him before what should happen: told him then that this iorney would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS, Socrates tolditto certaine of his very familiar frendes: and from them the rumor became common. And this E also troubled a number of them, for the valuckie dayes on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very dayes on the which the women celebrated the feast and vereday of Adons death: and there were also in divers partes of the city, images of dead men caried to burial and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that fuch as did put any confidence in those signes, sayd they misliked it much, and that they were asrayed least the same signified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was fet out with fuch pompe & brauery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this warre in open counfell, whilest they were deliberating aponit, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of so honorable a charge to make him chaunge his minde therein furely he shewed him selfe an honest man, wise, and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remoue the people from the enterprise of this warre, neither vet by flite nor intreaty get him felfe discharged from being a Captaine thereof, but that

Atterwould in any case make him one of the heades of the army then was it out of the so be retinated to Nicial faid thill gening backe, turning his head to oft like a child to looke apon his gallie be, for plants bindehim and cuer to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of this jorney, For in deede this was enough to discorage his companions, & to marre all at their first setting out: where, to fay truly, he should sodainly have fet apon his enemies, & haud cone to it with aluly corage, to haue affayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary courfe. For when Lamuches thought good at their first comming to goe straight to Synacysa, and to gette them battell as neere the walles as might be, & that Alcibiades on the other fide was of opinion first ofall to goe about to winne the cities that were in league with the Syracy sans, and after that they had made them rebell, then to goe against the Synagysans them selves. Wisim to the contrary spake in counsell, and thought it better to goe on fayer and softly, deserving the Nicial contrary the contrary space in comment, and thought the parties and preparation, & fo to returne firaight fell for intecoalles of Sicile round about to view their gallies and preparation, & fo to returne firaight fell for interding the Syto ATHENS againe, leaving only a few of their men with the EORSTANS, to helpe to defende racing only them. But this from the beginning marueloully cooled the corage of the fouldiers, and quite discoraged them. Shortly after also, the ATHENIAMS having sent for Alcibiades to aunswere to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in fight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenaunt generall of all the army) still yfed delayes, running vp and downe, and spending time so long in consultation till the souldiers were left without both hope and corage and the fease the nemy had of them at their first comming to fee fo great an army, was now in manex cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was fent for from ATHENS, they were with three fcore gallies to Synacvsa. of the which they placed fifty in battell ray out of the hauen, and fent the other renne into the hauento discouer: which approaching neere the city, caused an Herauld to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONT INES to their landes and posses fions, and tooke a shippe of the enemies, in the which among other thinges they founde tables, wherein were wrytten the names of all the inhabitants of Synac vsa, according to their wibes and houses. These tables were kept farre from the citie, in the temple of Jupiter Olympien, but at that time they had fent for them to know the number of men of feruice, and of age wheare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the generalls of the army, the foothfayers feeing this long rolle of names, at the first milliked it fearing least n the prophecy had bene fulfilled, which promifed them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACYSANS. Howebeit it is reported this prophecy came to pale in an other exployte, whe Callippus ATHENIAN having flaine Dion, wan also the city of SYBACVSA. Now when Alesbiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the fivay and commaunded the whole army. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stowte man, an honest man, and very Lamachus valliant of his handes, and one that would not spare him selfe in time of neede: neverthelesse vallians, but hewas so poore and miserable, that even when he was in state of a Generall, & gave yp an accompt of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much, for a gowne, and fo much for a payer of pantophles. Where Nician authority & reputacion contrary vife was of an other maner of cut, as well for other respectes, as for his riches, and for the honor of mat E synoble thinges which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and litting in counsell with his companion in the counfell house at A THENS, about the dispatch of certaine causes, he spake xnto souther land the Post. then present among est them; and bad him speake first and say his opinion; being the oldest man of all the whole company. And in fine, the fommer being farre peneral cias was informed that the Syracvsans had taken fuch corage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge apon them first: and that their horsemen were approached already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if the were come into Sicile to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to reftore the LEONTINES their landes againe. Hereupon with much a do, Nicias determined to goe to Syracys a and bicause he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hasard: he sent one of Carrier before to Syracusa, to tell them (as if he had bene a spye) that if they would sodainly come and fet apon the campe of the ATHENIANS & take all their carriage, he wished them to come a with all their power to CAT ANA at a day certains which he would appoint them. For the A. THENIANS (favd he) for the most parte are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens which fauoring the Syracus ans, have determined to foone as they heare of their comine to keepe the gates of the city, and at the same time also to fet the ATHENIANS shippes after and how there were also a great number in the citie of this confederacy, that did but lookes uery hower for their comming. And this was the noblest stratageame of warre, that Nicia shewed all the time he was in Sicile. For by this deuise he made the Syrac v sans comein to the fielde with all their power for that they left their citie without garde: and he him felfe them. There were not many of the Syrac vers flaine arthis battell, bicaufe their horsemen casion to mocke him. For comforting & encoraging the SYRACVSANS, he told them Nieli deserved to be laughed at, bicause he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from ATHENS to SYRACVSA to fight. This notwithstading, he made the

SYRACVSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose out & authority to commaund and take order for all thinges. The temple of Jupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIAN'S campe, which they would gladly have taken, for that it was full of rich inells and offeringes of gold and filuer, genen vnto the temple afore time. But Nicias of purpose still draue of time, and delayed so long, till the Synac v sans at last fent a good gas rilon thither to keepe it fafe : thinking with him felfe, that if his fouldiers came to take and fpoyle the temple, his contry should be nothing the richer by it, and him felse besides should beare all the blame of facrilege. So, having obteined victorie without profit, (which ranne

But contratily, Menander, and Enthide mus newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Niciai, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines (Nicias; and Demosthenes that was then comming) defitedto preuent Demofthener, in performing fome notable feruice before his arrivall & thereby also to excell Nites doinges. How beit, the cloke they had to couer their ambition with all was, the honor & reputacion of the city of ATHERS, the which (flayd they) were framed and difinonored for ener, if they now should thew the felues afraied of the Syn ac visales maho pro-D wokldthem to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his wilk to battell; in the which the A-THEN IN Swere flaine and our gonie, by the good counsell of a Corinthian Pilot called A riflon: For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides wryteth) was clearedy ouerthrowen, and they tolk a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed? considering on the one side that he had taken maruelous paines, whilest he was fole Cabraine of the whole army: and on thother fide, for that he had committed a fonle fault, when they had genen him companions, But as Nicias was in this great dispaire, they descried Demosthenes a. Demosthines

Now thought the Syrkovs xins them felues againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiving they strone against the streame; and consumed them scheer to no purpose, whe by that they saw there was no likely hoode to be delinered fro their noubles. And Nicias also reloyced, that so great aide was come, but his loy helde not longe. Whereupon the other

Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Eathydennes and Mender, fluckexo Demosthenes opinion: wherunto Nicias was also forced against his will to well So Demofibenes the selfe same night taking the footemen, went to affault the fort of Epipolis where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he flue many of them, and made the rest flee that offered resistannee. But not content with this victory, he went furder, till he fell apon the BOROTIANS. They gathering themselves together were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, basing their pikes with such furie and lowde cries, that they caused the former to retyre, and made all the rest of thassailantes asrayed and amased. For the formost thyinge backe, came full vpon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and their flight for a charge, refifted them with all their force, & fo miltaking one an other, both were wone ded and flaine, and the hurt they ment vnto their enemies, did vnfortunately light vpon their owne fellowes. For this multitude meetinge thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, & what for that they could not difcerne one an other in the night, the which was neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleere, as they might certainly indee by fight what they were that meethem: (for then the moone declined a pace, and the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to & fro) the seare they had of the enemy, made them mistrust their frendes. All these troubles and disaduantages had the A-

THE NIANS, and befide, the moone on their backes, which caufing the shadow to fall forward did hide their number, and gliftering of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets, glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the moone that shone vpon them, encreased their feare, and making them feeme a greater number and better appointed than they were in deede. At last, 1

backe and turne taile: some were flaine by their enemies, others by their owne company and others also brake their neckes falling from the rockes. The rest that were dispersed abroade in the fieldes, were the next morning euery man of them put to the fworde by the horsemen, So, the account made, two thowsand ATHENIANS were flaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwayes miltrufted it would thus come to passe, was maruelously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnes. But he excusing him selfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoyse sayle homewardes. For, sayd he, we must looke for no new aide from ATHENS, neither are we ftrong enough with this armie to ouercome our enemies and B though we were, yet must we of necessary avoide the place we are in, bicause (as it is reported) it is alwayes vnholsome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious by reafon of the automne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly see by experience. For many of their people were already ficke, and all of them in maner had no minde to tary. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, bicause he feared not the Syracvsans, but rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations & condemnation. And therefore in open counfell he told them, that as yet he faw no fuch daunger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather dye of his enemies hands, than to be put to death by his owne contrymen. Being therin of a contrary minde to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that fayd to his citizens. I had rather suffer death by you, than to be slaine with you. And surthermore, as for remouing their F campe to some other place, they should have leasure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had delivered this opinion in counfell, Demosthenes ha-

A wing hartill lucke at his first coming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Willia Rucke not fo hard against their departure, but that he relied apon the thust and confidence he had of fome within the city: they all agreed to Nieiss. But when newes came that there was a new supply come vnto the Syra ev sans, and that they faw the plague encrealed motearld more in their campe then Nicias felfe thought it belt to departe thence, and gaue notice to the fouldiers to prepare them felues to shippe away. Notwithstanding, when they hid put all thinges in readines for their departure, without any knowledge of thenemy, or fufolcion thereof: the moone beganne to eclipse in the night, and foddinly to lose her light, to The eclipse of the great feare of Nicias and divers others, who through ignoraunce and superfficion quaked at fuch fightes. For couching the eclipse and darkening of the funne, which as eder at any common person the moone, every common person then knew the cause to be the markenes of the body of the moone betwirt the funne and our fight. And the reason was, for that the people could not at that time abide them that professed the knowledge of natural Philosophy, & inquired of the causes of things:

for them they called then Mereopontoxuo, as much to fay, as curious inquirers, and tatlers of things about the reach of reason, done in heaven and in the aver. Bicause the people thought they afcribed that which was done by the goddes only, vnto certaine naturall and necessarie causes, that worke their effectes not by prohidence nor will, but by force, and necessary conlequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished from ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in The Atheprilon fro whence Pericles had much a do to procure his deliuery. And Socrates also, though niene do perhedid not medle with that parte of Philosophy, was notwithstanding put to death for the su- Philosophers. facion thereof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being received and liked, as well for his vertuous Socrates Page life, as also for that he submitted the necessity of naturall causes vnto the controlement & difpolition of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and fupreame cause: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of fuch disputations, and gaue open passage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes schollers and frendes, an Dyon very eclipse of the moone chaunfing euen at the very fame time that he was weying up his anckers skilfull in nato fayle from ZACYNTHE, to make warre with the tyran Dionyfius: being nothing afrayed not troubled therewithall, made fayle not with standing, and when he came to Syracus a draue out the tyran. But then it fell out vnfortunatly for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilful foothfaver: for the party which he was wont to vie for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this signe of the eclipse of the moone (as Philochorus fayth) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contratily very E good for fayd he, thinges that men doe in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemy vnto them. But this notwithstanding, their custome was not to kepe them selves close about three dayes in fuch eclipses of the moone and sunne, as Autoclides selfe prescribeth in a booke he made of fuch matters: where Nicias bare them then in hande, that they should ta- Nicias ignory the whole and full revolution of the course of the moone, as though he had not seene her ram of same straight cleere againe, after the had once passed the shadow and darkenes of the carth. Burall rall causes other thinges layed a fide and forgotten, Nicias disposed him selfe to sacrifice vnto the gods; until fuch time as the enemies came againe as well to befiege their fortes, and all their campe bylande, as also to occupy the whole hauen by sea. For they had not onely put men aborde into their gallies able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fisher botes and other F light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reviled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble house, called Heraelides whose bore being forwarder than his companions, was in daunger of taking by a gallie of the

Pollichus his vncle being afrayed of it, lanched formail with tenne gallies of Syracus x for his rescue, of the which him selfe was Captaine with other gallies douting also least Pollichas should take hurt, came on likewise a mayne : fresh there fell out a great battell by fea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and flue Eurymedonial Captaine, and many other, This made the fouldiers of the ATHENIANS fo afrayed, sharther beganne to crie out, it was no lenger tarying there, and that there was none other way button departe thence by land. For after the Syrac vsans had wonnethat battell, they had flound thut yo the hauen mouth. Nicias could not confent to fuch a retyre. For, fayd he it would be too great a thanne for them to leave their gallies and other thippes to the enemy confidering the number not to be much leffe then two hundred : but he thought good rather to arrive hundred andrenne gallies with the best & valllangest of their footemen, and darters, than were in the army, bicaufe the other gallies had spent their owers. And for the rest of the army we cias for faking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Herrale) did fer the in battell ray apon the peere of the hauen. Infomuch, that the Synar vs ans which vntill that day could not performe their wonted facrifices vnto Hertules: did then fendether Priestes and Captaines thither to do them. The fouldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Prieftes and Soothfavers came and told the Synkicus ans, that vindoutedly the figures of the mife victory facrifices did promife the a noble victory, so that they gave no charge, but only stoode your to the Syra. their defence: for fo did Hercules cuer ouercome, defending, when he was affailed. With this good hope the Syracvs ans rowed forward, and there was fuch a hot and cruell battelling fea as had not bene in all this warre before : the which was as dreadfull to them that floode of on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, seeing the whole conflict and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hunter them selves by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranckes of their shippes, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great shippes together, fighting with

the Athenians onely casting their dartes, and vsing their bowes and slinges, by meanesof their rowing up and downe could not lightly ame to hit with the head. That maner of fight Aristo a Corinthian (an excellent shippe maister) had taught the Syracysans, who was him selfe slaine valliantly fighting, when they were conquerers. The ATHENIANS therupon being driven to fight, having fusteined a marvelous slaughter & overthrow, (their way to fie by fea being also cleerely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardw faue them selves by lande: were then so discoraged as they made no lenger resistaunce when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their shippes, before their faces. Neither did they aske leave to take up their dead mens bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forfake their difeafed and fore wounded companions, than to bury them that were already flains. When they confidered all these thinges, they thought their owne state more miserable than theirs, which were to end their lines with much more cruelty, than was their milery prefent.

So they being determined to departe thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the Syancie. SANS through all the citie disposed them selves to facrifice to the goddes, and to be merly, as & well for the joy of their victorie, as also for Hercules feast: thought it bootelesse to perswade them, and much leffe to compell them, to take armes vppon a fodaine, to fet apon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates denifing with him felfe how to deceive Nieias, sent some of his frendes vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to fend him fecret intelligence of all thinges during this warre: and willed him to take heede not to departe that night, least he fell into the ambushes which the Syracy-SANS had layed for him, having fent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and subtilty, stayed there that night, as though he had bene afrayed to fall within the daunger of his enemies ambush. There upon, the Syracvs ans the next morning by peepe of day, hoyfed fayle, got the straights of F Nicias passage, stopped the rivers mouthes, & brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsemen in a fquadron in the next plaine fieldes adioyning, fo that the ATHENIANS had no way

Areus Crassus was the sonne of a Cenfor, who had also received the honor of triumphe: but him felfe was brought up in a litle house with two other of his brethren, which were both maried in their fathers mothers life time, and kept house together. Whereuppon it camen passe, that he was a man of such sober and temperate dyet, that one of his brethre being deceased, he maried his wife by whom he had chi dren. For women, he lived as continent a life, as any Romans of his time: notwithstanding, afterwardes being of riper yeares, he was accused by Plotinus to have deflowred one of the Vestall Nunnes called

Licinia. But in troth the cause of that suspicion grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleasaunt garden hard by the suburbes of the city, wherewith Crassus was maruelously in love, and would faine haue had it good cheape: and vpon this only occasion was often seene in speeche with her, which made the people suspect him. But for a smuch as it seemed to the judges that his couetouines was the cause that made him follow her, he was clered of thincest suspected, but he neuer lest followinge of the Nunne, till he had gotthe garden of her. The ROMANES for there was but that only vice of couetouines in Craffus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, since it grew so great, as the note of that only did hide and couer all his other vices. Nowe to fet out his extreame couetous desire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifest reasons. The first, his maner and meanes he yied to get: and these craffurither. conde, the greatnes of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worther then three hundred talentes. And during the time that he delt in the affayers of the common wealth, he offered the tenthes of all his goodes wholly vnto Hercules, kept open house for all the people of Rome, and gaue also to enery citizen of the same as much corne as would kepe him three monethes: & yet when he went from Rome to make warre with the PARTHIANS, him felfe being defirous to know what all he had was worth, founde that it amounted to the fumme of feuen thowsande one hundred talentes. But if I may with license vse euill speeche, wryting a troth: I say he got the most parte of his wealth by fire and blood, raising his greatest reuenue of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had take the citie of Rome, he made portefale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gaue most, tearming them his

A booty, onely for that he would the nobility, and greatest men of power in the cities should be partakers with him of this iniquity: and in this open fale Crassus never left taking of giftes, nor bying of thinges of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Craffus perceiuinge that the greatest decay commonly of the buildinges in Rome came by fire, and falling downe of houses, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of stories built one apon an other: bought bondmethat were masons, carpinters, and these deuisours and builders, & of those he had to the number of five hundred, Afterwardes, when the fire tooke any house, he would buy the house while it was a hurning, and the next houses adioyning to it, which the owners folde for litle, being then in daunger as they were, and a burning : fo that by proces of time, the most plante of the houses ni but would have more, made them this aunswer. The gods forbid any Roman & fhould thinke ly demaunde his money of them. So, his curtefie to lende many times without interest; did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vsery. In deede when he bad any man to than if he had bene more plentifull of dyet and diffnes. As for his learning and fludy, he chiefly dustry and diligent indeuor excelled all them that even by nature were most apt vnto it. For fome fay, he had neuer fo fmall nor little a cause in hande, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing studied his case before for pleading: and oftentimes also when Pompey, Cefar, and Cicero refused to rise, and speake to matters, Crassus would defend every cause if he were requested.

And therfore was he generally beloued & well thought of, bicaufe he shewed him selfe pain-full, & willing to helpe every man. Likewife was his gentlenes maruelously esteemed, bicause hetaluted every body curteoully, and made much of all men: for, whom so ever he meet in the

in Rome came to be his. But not with standing that he had so many slaues to his workemen. he neuer built any house from the ground, sauing his owne house wherein he dwelt : saving that fuch as delighted to builde, vadid them selves without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mynes of filuer, many ploughes, and a number of hyndes and plowmen to followe the same: yet all that commoditie was nothing, in respect of the profit his slatter and bondemen brought him dayly in. A sreaders, scriueners, goldsmythes, bankers, receiuers. stewards of householde, caruers, and other such officers at the table, taking paines him selfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to instruct them what they should does and to be shorte. Craffue care hethought the greatest care a good householder ought to haue, was to fee his states by fernauntes well taught, being the most lively cattell and best instruments of a mans house! And furely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake : that all thinges What bemust be done by servauntes, and his servauntes must be ruled by him. For we see that the aree langut to and skill to be a good husbande, when it confifteth in gouernment of thinges without life or ay, and in fence, is but a base thing, only tending to gaine; but when it dependeth apon good order and whom it congovernment of men, me thinkes then it is to knowe how to governe well a common wealth: 69th.

But as his judgement was good in the other, so was it very bad in this that he thought no man craffic indgeriche, and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole army with his owne proper goods. For many who was the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to fay) is not made with any certainty of expences Archidamus and therefore there must no sufficiency of riches be limited for the maintenance of the same. It is fayd also he was very well studied in sto-Fries, and indifferently seene in Philosophy, specially in Aristotels workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and pacient of nature, by vling of Craffu company: for it were hard to fay, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Craffin or made poorer while he was withhim. Of all his frendes he would euer haue Alexandra broade with him, and while they were abroade, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way : but fo foone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull pacing of a man? to see that he making profession of Philosophie as he did, the poore man beingin great pouerty, did not place pouerty in thinges indifferent. But hereof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and comming on directly towards Rome, euery man suspected straight their coming was for no good to the common wealth but as appeared plainly, for the death and destruction of the noblest men of Rome. For its fell out in deede, that they flue all the chiefe men they found in the city, among whom Craffe father & his brother were of the number, and him felfe being at that time but young, escaped traffur fints the prefent daunger only by flight. Furthermore, Craffus hearing that they layed waite to the him, & that the tyrannes fought him in every place, tooke three of his frends in his company, Vibius hearing that Crassus was fafe, and had scaped, becamevewas gotten, went not him felfe to fee him, but called one of his flaues (who was his receiped and occupied that ground for him) & bringing him neere the place where Crassus was, commaunded him enery night to prouide meate for supper, to bring it ready dressed to this rock whereunder was the cane, & make no wordes of it, neither be inquifitiue for whom it was for if he did, he should dye for it: & otherwise, for keping the thing secret as he commaunded he promifed to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the fea fide, & is closed in round about with two rockes that mete together, which receive a foft coole winde into them, Whe ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownes thereof are many other caues of great receite one within an other, and befides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of paffing good water running hard by the rocke, and the name rall riftes of the rockes also receiving the light without, where they mete together, do fendin inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruelous light, and hath no dampe aye, but very pure and drye, by reason of the thickenes of the rocke, which sendeth all the moisnesse and vapour into that springinge well, Crassus keeping close in this caue, Vibius recents brought vittells thither dayly to relieue him, and his company, but faw not them he brought itto, nor could understand what they were:and yet they saw him plainly, observing the hour & time of his comming when he brought the same. He provided them no more then would euen necessarily serue their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheare withall : for

Vibius was bent to entertaine Crassus as honorably as he could possible, infomuch as he con-

Sylla afterwardes arriving in I TALIE, intending to insploy all the young nobility he had in his copany, gaue enery one of them charge under him. and fent Crassius into the contry of the MARSIANS, to leavy men of warre there. Crassius desi- crastius sens ring certaine bandes of Sylla to aide him, being driven to passe by his enemies: Sylla aunswe- by Sylla mio red him angrely againe. Crassus being netled with these wordes, departed thence presently, and stowtly passing through his enemies, leavied a good number of fouldiers: & was ever after ready at Syllaes commaundement in all his warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention between him and Pom: The emilaper, For Pompey being younger than Craffus, and borne of a wicked father in Rome, whom the tion beine site people more hated tha euer they did manicame yet to great honor by his valliancy, & by the Pomper notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, Sylla called which he feldom did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equalls: as to rife vp when he came towardes him, to put of his eappe, to call him Imperator, as much C as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Crassus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, bicaute he had no experience in matters of warto at that time. and also bicause these two vices that were bred in him, misery and couetousnes, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the facke of the city of TVDER, which he tooke, he prive- craffice tooke ly got the most parte of the spoyle to him selfe, wherof he was accused before Sylla. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the confilcate goodes of the outlawes appointed to be

D flaine, for litle or nothing. And it is fayd also, that he made one an outlaw in the contry of the BRYTIANS, without Syllaes privitie or commaundement, only to have his goodes. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vse him in any open service. Surely this is a straunge thing. that Crassus felfe being a great flatterer of other, & could creepe into any mans fanor: was ver himselfe case to be won through flattery of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is fayd of him that he had this property: that shough him felfe was as extremely conerous as might be, yer he bitterly reprotted and vtterly mifliked them that had his owne hus mor of auarice. Pompeyes Honor that he attained vinto dayly, by bearing great charge and title craffue enui. in the warres, did greatly trouble Craffus both bicaufe he obtained the honor of triumphe be est Pompey. forche came to be Senatour, and also for that the Romanes commonly called him, Pompetus The Romanes E Magnus, to fay, Pompey the great: Craffus beinge in place on a time when one fayd that lawe called Pom-Pompey comming fee, Pompey the great is come. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Crassis away with any open malice and ill will. For though he was fory to fee Pompey and Cafar honored about him : yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cafar when he was taken by pyrates in As IA(as he was once) and being kept prisoner cryed out alowde: O Cret (us, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou shalt heare I am in prison. The ware of when they met him. The commocion of fenfers, which some call Spartacus warre, their wathe bindmen, sting and destroying of ITALIB came apon this occasion. In the citie of CAPVA, there was D one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fenfers at vnrebated foyles, whom the Ro-MANES call Gladiatores, whereof the most partewere GAVLES and THRACIANS. These men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had comitted, but only for the wickednes of their

By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes loden with fenfers weapons, that were brought from Carra going to some other city: those they also tooke by force, and arming them selves therewith got them then to a strong place of scituacion. Where amongest them selues they chose three a Captaines, and one Spartaces a THRACIAN borne (and of those contrymen that go wanding vp and downe with their heards of beaftes neuer staying long in a place) they made their Ge nerall. This Spartaces was not onely valliant, but strong made withall, and endued with more wisedom and honesty, than is commonly found in men of his state and condicion: and force uility and good viderstanding, a man more like to the GRECIANS, than any of his comile men comonly be. It is reported, that when Spartaces came first to Rountobe fold for assause there was founde as he flept, a fnake wound about his face. His wife feeing it being his come contry woman, & a wife woman befides, poffest with Bacchus spirite of dinimation: faid plains ly that it did fignifie, that one day he shoulde be of great power, much dread, and haue very good fuccesse. This same woman prophetesse was then with him, and followed him likewise it when he fled. Now first they ouerthrewe certaine souldiers that came out of CAPVA against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their armor & weapons, made them glid a make the fenfers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnfeemely. After that, the Ro-WANES fent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thowsand men. Who besieged them in Clodius a Rotheir forte, scituate apon a hill that had a verie steepe and narowe ascent vitto it, and kept the naffage vp to them: all the reft of the grounde rounde about it, was nothing but high rockes sometime hanging ouer, & apon the greatstore of wilde vines. Of them the bondmen cut the strongest with 3000 flippes, and made thereof ladders, like to these shippe ladders of ropes, of such a length and follrong, that they reached from the toppe of the hill even to the very bottome: apon those shey all came fafely downe, fauing one that taried aboue to throwe downe their armor after them, who afterwards by the fame ladder faued him felfe last of all. The Romanes mistrusting cliditie the

Thereupon divers heardmen and sheapherds that kept cattell hard by the hill, joyned with the ROMANES that fled, being strong and hardy men: of which somethey armed, and others they yied as scowtes and spialls to discotter. But his fouldiers trustinge to their multitude, and perswading them selues to doe great thinges: would not obey him therein, but went againe to fpoile and ouerrunne all IT A-D LIB. The Senate of ROME being in a great perplexity, not onely for the shame and dishonor that their men should be ouercome in that forte by slaues and rebells, but also for the feare & daunger all ITALIE stoode in besides: sent both the Consults together, Gellius and Lentulus, Gellius and

Now went Crassus from Rome, and camped in Roma-NIA, tarying Spartacus comming, who was marchine thitherwarde. Hereupon Crassius was grieuously offended a with Mummiu, and receiuing his fouldiers that fled, gaue them other armor and weapons but yet vpon fureties, that they should keepe them better thencefoorth, than they had before The Romans done. Now Craffes of the fine hundred that were in the first ranckes, and that first fled, thembe deuided into fifty times ten, and out of euery one of those he put one of them to death as the lot fell out: renuing againe the auncient discipline of the Romanes to punish cowardly foul. diers, which of long time before had not bene put in vie. For it is a kinde of death that bring. eth open shame withall, and bicause it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the resdue afrayed to see the terror of this punishment. Crassius having done execution in this some apon his men, led his armie against Spartacus: who still drue backe, vntill he came to these fide through the contry of the Lycanians, where he found in the straight of the Far of Mai-l $1NA, certaine pyrates shippes of CILICIA, and there determined to goe into SICILIA, And having put two thowfande men into Sicils, he then revived the warre there of the flanes which was but in maner newly ended, and lacked small prouocation to beginne it againe. Craffus comming thither to feele him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he should doe: determined with a walle to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this litle Ilande, both to keepelis men occupied from idlenes, & his enemies also from virtell. This was a maruelous hardand long peece of worke, notwithstanding, Crassus finished it beyonde all mens expectationing very shorte time, and brought a trenche from one side of the sea to the other ouerthwartthis barre, which was three hundred furlonges in length, fifteenefoote broade, and so manyin height: and apon the toppe of this trenche built a high wall, of a maruelous strength, wherof Spartaces at the first made light accompt, and laughed at it. But when pillage beganne to faile him, & traueling all about the lle for vittells, perceiuing him felfe to be thut in with this wall. and that there was no kinde of vittells to be had within all the compaffe of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boysterous night, the winde being very great, when it snewed exceedingly, set his men a worke, and filled vp a peece of the trenche (being of a small bredth) with earth, stones, and boughes of trees, whereupon he passed ouer the third parte of his army. Crassus at the first then became asrayed, least Spartacus would have taken his way directly D toward Rome: but he was soone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out to gether, and that a great number of them rebelling against Spartaens, went & camped by them A runderfull felues by the lake of Lucania, which water by reporte hath this variable property, that at

Crassus going to set apon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great nuber of them, nor follow them very farre: bicause Spartage came presently to the rescue with his army, who stayed the chase. Crassus had wrytten letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, & Pompey out of SPAYNE, wheref he then repented him, & made all the possible speede he could to end this warre, before either of them came thither : knowing, that which of them fo euer came to his helpe, to him E would the people gene the honor of ending this warre, and not to him felfe. Wherefore he first determined to affaile them that had revolted from Spartacus, and camped by them selues Ambush laied who were led by Cains Canicius, and an other called Castus. So Crassus sent six thowsand sootemen before to take a hil, commaunding them to lye as close as they could, that their enemies might not discouer them: and so they did, and couered their morians & headpecces as well.

as might be, from being seene. Neuerthelesse they were discouered by two women doing secrifice for the lafety of their army: and therupon were all in great halard of casting away, had The validamen not Crassius bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruellest battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were flaine of the flaues at that battel, twelue Joudiers, Specialcut re. thow fand and three hundred, of which, two only were found hurt in the backes, and all the F rest slaine in the place of their ranckes, valliantly fighting where they were set in battell ray. mountaines of Spartacus after this ouerthrowe, drew towardes the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintus, a one of Crassus Lieutenauntes, and Serofa his treasorer followed him, still skirmishing with his receivard all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned fodainly apon them, made the Romanes flic that still harried his men in that forte, and hurt Scrofa Crassus treasorer, so fore that he hardly escaped with life. But the vantage they had of the Romanes by this ouerthrow, fell out in the ende to the vtter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to fuch a stowtenes and pride of them selues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any lenger obey their leaders and Captaines ; but by the way as they went, they compafied them in with their weapons, and tolde them, that they hould go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through L v-GANIA against the ROMANES. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had received newes that Pompey was comming, and that divers were futers for him at Rome to be fent in this jorney, faying, that the last victory of this warre was due to him, and that he would difoatche it at a battell, as foone as he came thither. Craffus therefore feeking occasion to fight. lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day cast a trenche, which the bondmen feeking to preuent, came with great fury, and fet apon them that wrought. Wherupon fell out a hotte skirmishe, and still supplies came on of either side : so that Spartacus in the ende perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had fet them in order, & that they brought him his horse he was wont to fight on he drew out The fighte con his fword, and before them all flue the horse dead in the place, saying: if it be my fortune to rage of Sparwinne the field. I know I shall have horse enow to serve my turne; and if I chaunse to be overcomen, then shal I nede no moe horses. After that, he flew in among the ROMANES, thinking to attaine to figir t with Craffus, but he could not come neere him : yet he flue with his owne handes two ROMANE Centurions that refifted him. In the end, all his men he had about him. for fooke him and fled, fo as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valliantly figh- spartacus ting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Crassus fortune was very good in this warre, saine. and that he had shewed him selfe a noble and valliant Captaine, venturing his persone in any daunger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honor of ending this warre: for the flaues that scaped from this last battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeyes handes; who made an end of all those rebellious rascalls. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassias had ouercomen the slaues in battell, but that he him selfe had pulled vp that warre euen by D the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into Rome, and triumphed for his victorie Pompeyes of Sertorius, and the conquest of SPAYNE. But for this small triumphe, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it different from the great triumphe: fee Marcellus life, where we Onsile fee haue at large discoursed thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Consult: Crassus, though he Marcellin floode in good hope to be chosen Consull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his frendthippe and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer defirous to make Craffus beholding to him; whereupon he delt frendly for him, and spake openly in thatsembly

But in the ende of their Confulthip, at a common feeling of the counsell holden, there was a knight of Rome called Onatius Aurelius (a man not greatly kno-Rome wen, for that he had no dealinges in the state, and kept most in the contry) who gettinge vp to the pulpit for orations, told the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame, supiter, said The dreame is all that Crassis did of any accomptin his Consulthip. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any acte done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the menof warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goodes: although Luctatius Catulus wa his colleague and fellowe Cenfor, as gentle a persone as any of that time that lived in Rone Now Crassas at the first entry into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent ad m bring EGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMANES, Catulus did ftowthy withftand him: wherby dif office and authority of Conful cealed, he fayd: that Crassus came one night to him, & shewel him a letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassus ever after hated him: and that he did not openly revenge it, the let was by meane of his tonne. For Publius Crassus much favoring eloquence, and beinge genen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero : in such forte, that apon his banishment he puton chaunged garmentes as Cicero did, and procured many other youthes to do the like allo, and in fine, perswaded his father to become his frend. Casar now returning to Rome from the pro-

uince he had in gouernment, intended to fue for the Confulshippe: and perceiuing that Pomper & Crassus were againe at a jarre, thought thus with him selfe, that to make the one of them his frend to further his fuce, he should but procure thother his enemy: and minding therfore to attaine his defire with the fauor of them both, fought first the meanes to make the frendes. & perswaded with them, that by their controuersie thone seeking thothers vindoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authority, who of them selues were of no power, if they two loyned in frendshippe together: for making both their frendes and factions one they might rule the state and common wealth even as they would. Cafar having by his perswasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, madel them selues vnuincible, which afterwardes turned to the destruction of the people and Se Cafar, al three nate of Rome. For he made them not only greater than they were before, the one by theothers meanes: but him selfe also of great power through them. For when they beganne to fauor Cafar, he was straight chosen Consull without any deniall: and so behaued him selse in the Consulfhip, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then sent him togouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may fay, even them felues to put him into the castell that should kepe all the citie in subjection: imagining that they two should make spoyle and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a government. Now for Pomper, the cause that made him commit this error was nothing els, but his extreame ambition, But as for Crassus, besides his old vice of couetousnes rooted in him, he added to that a new eaus.

rice and desire of triumphes and victories, which Cafars fame for prowes and noble actes in warres did throughly kindell in him, that he being otherwise his better in all thinges, might not yet in that be his inferior : which furie tooke fuch holde as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the common wealth to great mifery. Thus Cafar being come out of his prouince of GAVLE vnto LVCA, divers ROMANES went thither to fee him, and among other, Pompey and Crassus. They having talked with him in secret, agreed among them to deuise to have the whole power of Roms in their handes : so that Cesar should kepe his armie together, and Crassas and Pompey should take other provinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one : that Pompey and Crassian thould againe sue these cond time to be Confulls, and that Cafars frendes at Rome should stand with them for it, fen-F ding also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of choosing the Consults. Thereupon Pompey and Crassias returned to Roma to that ende, but not without suspicion of

A their practife : for there ranne a rumor in the citie, that their meeting of Cafar in Lvc a, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he ment to make fute to be Confull. Pompey aunswered them : peraduenture he did, peraduen. Pompey it nure he did not. They asking him agains the same question: he aunswered, he would sue for from aunswirt. the good men, not for the euill. Pompeyes answers were thought very prowde & hawty. Howheit Craffus auniwered more modeftly, that if he faw it necessary for the common wealth. he craffus mo-

per and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left of their sute for feare of them. Domitim only excepted: whom Cate to prayed and intreated, as his kinfeman and frend, that he made him to feeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the detense of their libertie. and how that it was not the Confulshippe Crassius and Pompey looked after, but that they went ahout to bring in a tyranny: & that they fued not for the office, but to get fuch provinces and armies into their handes as they defired, vnder colour and countenaunce of the Confulship. Cato ringing these words into their eares, & beleuing it certainly to be true as he sayd, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men joyned with their bicause they wondred what the matter ment that these two noble men should sue the second time to be Confulls, and why they made fute to be joyned together, and not to have any other with them, confidering there were fo many other worthy men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he should be preuented of his purpose, Pompey made fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongest other, when the day came to choose Crassia Conthe Confulls, Domitius going earely in the morning before day, accopanied with his frends fall by force. so the place where the electio should be: his man that caried the torch before him was flaine. by some whom Pompey had layed in waite, & many of his companie hurt, and among others, Cato. And having thus dispersed them, he beset a house rounde about whether they fled for Succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consults together. Shortly Pomper and after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market place, fraffin con-& flue some of them that relisted & would not flye. They also then prolonged Cefars gouern- cond time. ment of the GAVLES for five yeres more, and procured for them selves by decree of the peo-

one fide were loth Pompey thould goe farre from Rom E: & him felfe also louing his wife well, the general was glad he had occasion to be so neere her, that he might remaine the most of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other rejoyced most at his happe, that he should goe into Syria: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iorney, were he in neuer fo great or straunge company. Furthermore, being among his frendes and familiars; he would geue out such fonde boastes of it. as no young man could have made greater vauntes: which was cleane contrary to his yeres and nature, having lived all his life time as modeftly, and with as finall oftentacion as any man liuing. But then forgetting him selfe too much had such fond conceites in his heade, as he not E only hoped after the conquest of Syria, and of the PARTHIANS, but flattered him felfe that the world (hould fee all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would fay) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Occean fea toward the East, though in the decree passed by the people there was no mention made of any warres against the PARTHI-ANS. Nowe every man fawe Crassus ambition and greedy define of honor: infomuch as Casar felle wrote vnto Crassus out of GAVLE, commending his noble intent and forwardnes, and withed him to goe thorow therewith. But Atteins one of the Tribunes being bent against Craf- Ancies the for to withstand his departure: (having divers other confederats with him to further his purpole, who much misliked that any man of a brauery and lustines should make warre with any F nation or people that had no way offended the Romane sibutwere their frends and confede-

This notwithstanding, Asteins the Tribune stepped before them and commaunded Crassiss he should not departe the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commaunded the one of the officers to lay hold of him, & to arrest him:howbeit the other Tribunes wouldness fuffer the officer to doe it. So the fergeaunt difmiffed Craffus. Then Atteins running towards the gate of the city, got a chafingdish with coles, & set it in the middest of the streete. thowfand men of armes, all choise men. This me thinkes was the greatest fault Crasses committed in all his enterprise of that warre. For when he should presently have gone on still and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANA) ! he tracted time, & gaue them leafure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe they found great fault with him for spending of his time when helauin SYRIA feeming rather to leade a marchauntes life, than a chieferaines. For he neuer faw his army, nor trained them out to any marshall exercise, but fell to counting the reuenue of the cities, and was many dayes bufily occupied weying of the gold and filuer in the temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that: he sent to the people, princes, and cities about him: to furnishe him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would discharge them for a summe of money. All these things made him to be both ill spoken of, & despised of every body. The first token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddesse Hierapoli whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Juno, and others, that she is the mother and chiefe F cause that giveth beginning of moisture to every thing that commeth forth and hath a being, and taught men the original cause also of every good thing. For as Crassus the father, & some Further, if it were (as he had heard say) that Crassian against the peoples mindes to all the kings of ROME, for his owne couetous desire, and peculiar profit was come in a iolity to make warre of the Pathiwith the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their contry: then in that respect Arfaces would deale ambassadors more fauorably, in confideration of Crassus yeares, and was contented also to suffer his men to of the Parthideparte with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in prison, than in garrison within his crassia.

gires. Thereto Crassias coragiously aunswered, that he would make them aunswere in the city of Selev CIA. Therewith Vagifes, one of the eldest Ambassadors fell a laughing, and thewing Vagifes words, Craffus the palme of his hand, told him thus heare will fooner grow in the palme of my hand, for the palme Craffus, than you will come to Selevels. In this forte the Ambaffadors tooke their leave of of his hande. Craffin, and returned to their kinge Hyrodes, tellinge him he was to prepare for warre. In the Hyrodes, king meane space, certaine of Crassius souldiers whom he had left in garrison in the cities of ME-ofthe Partis-SOPOTAMIA, having scaped maruelous daungerously and with great difficulty; brought him newes of importance, having them selves seene the wonderfull great campe of the enemy & their former stowtnes and corage, being borne in hande before, that the PARTHIANS diffe-

The soothsayers them selues did partely let Crass Grassus fore. fus understand, that the goddes shewed no good tokens in all their facrifices, and were hardly warned by the to be pacified. But Crassing gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him birill secure. as much, but only listned to them that counfelled him to make hast. Yet Crassias chiefest comforte and incoragement, was of Artabazes, king of Armenia, who came to his campe with Artabazes, fixethowfand horse, which were but only the kinges cornet and garde. Againe he promised king of Armenia, canse him other tenne thowfand horsemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thowsande footemen to Crassite which he kept continually in pay, and counfelled Craffus to enter the PARTHIANS CONTIE y- campe. pon Armeniaes fide: bicause his campe shoulde not onely have plenty of vittells, which he would fend him out of his contry, but for that he should also march in more fafety, having a contrie full of mountaines and woddes before him very ill for horsemen, which was the only strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Crassius coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will. & all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iorney through MESOPOTAMIA. where he had left many good fouldiers of the ROMANES. And thus departed the king of AR-

MENIA from him. But now as Crassus was passing his army apon the bridge he had made ouer pronderfull the river of Euphrates, there fel out fodaine straunge & terrible crackes of thuder, with feare- figner and tofull flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke clowde full his ancesters, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the roial crowne or diadeame apon the kinges head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrades that then reigned to his then brought Crassis to believe all that he sayd, and drawen him by perswasion from the river of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine contrie, meeting at the first with very good way, but after

612 came a wonderfull storme and tempest of winde apon the bridge, that the maruelous form thereof ouerthrewe a great parte of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Besides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twife striken with two great thunder clappes. Ones his great horse in like case, being brauely furnished and set out, tooke the bit in his teeth, and lept into the river with his ryder on his backe, who were both drowned; and neuer feenest ter. They say also, that the first Eagle & ensigne that was to be taken up when they marched turned backe of it felfe, without any handes layed vppon it. Further it fortuned that as the were distributing the vittells vnto the souldiers, after they had all passed ouer the bridge, the first thing that was genen them, was salte, and water lintels, which the ROMANES take for a token of death and mourning, bicause they vie it at the funeralles of the deade. After all this when Crassas was exhorting his fouldiers, a worde scaped his mouth that troubled the amie marueloufly. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer then uer of Euphrates, of purpose, bicause there should not a man of them returne backe against Where in deede when he had seene that they tooke this word in ill parte, he should have called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, feeing his men fo amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was so wilfull. In the ende he made ordinarie sacrifice for the purging of hisar-my: and when the Soothfayer gaue him the intrells of the beaft that was facrificed, they fell out of his handes. Crassus perceiving that the standers by were troubled withall, tell a laughing, and told them, you see what age is: yet shall you not see my sword fall out of my hande So having ended his facrifice, he beganne to marche forwarde into the contrie by therium craffus armie fide, with seuen legions of sootemen, and little lacke of soure thowsand horse, and in maneras many shot and slinges lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his skoutes that had viewed the contry, and told him there was not an enemy to be seene in the field: howbeit that they had founde the tracke of a maruelous number of horse, which seemed as they were returned backe. Then Crassias first of all beganne to hope well: and his souldiers also, they fellm despise the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Cassius his treasorer ever perswaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to re-

by the rivers fide, which lay fit for him to vittell him felfe eafily by botes that would always follow his campe, & should be fure befides that the enemies could not enuiron him behinde,] fo that having no way to fet apon the but before, they should have none advantage of them. Crassus going about then to consult of the matter, there came one Ariannes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtill fellow, which was the greatest mischiefe and euill, that fortune could fend to Craffus at that present time, to bring him to vtter ruine and destruction. For there were some of Crassius souldiers that had served Pompey before in that contrie, who knew him very well, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleafures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMANES. But Ariannes had benelabored at that time by the king of PARTHIABS Captaines, & was wonne by them te deceiue Craffus, and to intife him all he could, to drawe him from the river and the wordy contry, & to bring him into the plaine fielde, where they might compaffe him in with their horfemen: for they

ment nothing leffe than to fight with the ROMANES at the swordes poynte. This barbarous Ariannes de. Captaine Ariannes comming to Crassus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Crassus army, reprouing him that he came fo flowly forward, tracting time in that force as he did, preparing him

Therfore if you determine (fayd he) to fight, it were good you made haft to meete them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For nowe you haue but Surena and Sillaces, two of his Lieutenauntes against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you that you followe him not F and for the king him selfe, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lyed in all, Forking Hyrodes had deuided his army in two partes at the first, whereof him selfe tooke the one, and

Wof SELEVCIA, him felfe being the first man that scaled the walls, and ouerthrew them with his owne handes that relifted him. And though he was vnder thirtie yeares of age, yet they Surena a counted him a wife man, as well for his counfell, as his experience, which were the meanes young many whereby he ouercame Crassus. Who through his rathnes and folly at the first, and afterwards but very C for very feare and timerousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariannes hauing with very ill, bicaufe they entred into fandes where their feete soncke deepe, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could deceme by eye, fo that not only extreame thirst, and miserable way maruelously amazed the Romanes, but the discomforte of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that, abone all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For neither farre nor nere any fight of tree; nuer, brooke, mountaine, graffe, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an n endlesse sea of desert sandes on euerie side, rounde about their campe. Then beganne they to suspect that they were betraied. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA. Artabazes was kept in his contrie with a great warre king Hyrodes made apon him, which kept him that fem an Emhe could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towardes ARMENIA, that both their armies being joyned together they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwayes keepe the woddy contrie, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountaines: Crassus was fo wilfull, as he would wryte no aunswere to it, but angrily told the messenger, shathe had no crass was

Cassius his treasorer was much offended with Crassus for this an-F fwere: howbeit perceiuing he could doe no good with him, and that he tooke enery thing in euillparte, he fayd vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariannes prayed him to have pacience, and going and comming by the bandes, feeming to helpe the fouldiers, he tolde them merily : O my fellowes, I beleue you thinke to marche through the contry of Naples, and looke to meete with your pleafaunt fpringes, goodly groues of wodde, F your naturall bathes, and the good innes round about to refreshe you, and doe nor remember that you passe through the desertes of ARABIA and Assyria. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMANES a while: but afterwardes he dislodged betimes, before he was openly knowen for a traitor, and yet not without Crassus printity, whom he bare in hande that he would goe fet fome broyle and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Carl fus the very same day came out of his tent not in his coate armor, of scarlet, (as the maner was of the ROMANE Generalls) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring him felfe, he firming chaunged it againe. It is fayd moreouer, that the enfigne bearers when they should marcha way, had much a doe to plucke their enfignes out of the ground, they stucke so fast. But out. fur scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to marche forward, compelling the foots men to goe as fast as the horsemen, till a fewe of their skowtes came in, whom they had fer to discouer: who brought newes howe the enemies had slaine their fellowes, and what adde they had them selues to scape with life, and that they were a maruelous great army, & welan pointed to geue them battell. This newes made all the campe afrayed, but Crassus selfemore than the rest, so as he beganne to set his men in battell ray, being for hast in maner besides him felfe. At the first following Cassius minde, he set his ranckes wide, casting his souldiers into square battell, a good way a sonder one from an other, bicause he would take in as muchos the plaine as he coulde, to keepe the enemies from compassinge them in, and so deuided the horsemen into the winges. Yer afterwardes he chaunged his minde againe, and straued the battell of his footemen, facioning it like a bricke, more long than broade, making a frontand shewing their faces every way. For there were twelve cohorts or enfignes imbattelled one ther side. & by euery cohorte a company of horse, bicause there should be no place lest with out aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be a like defended. Then he gaue Castin the leading of one wing, his sonne Publius Crassus the other, and him selfe led the battel in the middest. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Balissas. where there was no great store of water, but yet happely lighted on for the souldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painefull way, where they had met with no water before. There the most parte of Crassus Captaines thought best to campeal night, that they might in the meane time finde meanes to knowe their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Craffus yeelding to his fonnes and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to marchen with his army, and to fet apon the enemy prefently: commaunded, that fuch as would ease. should eate standing, keeping their ranckes. Yet on the sodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole army, he commaunded them againe to march, not faver and I foftly as when they go to geue battell, but with speede, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the Romanes at the first to be so great a number, neither so brauelie armed as they

And Surena also, General of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a personage, and as valliant, as any other in all his host, though his beawtie somewhat effeminate, in judgement shewed small likelyhoode of any such corage: for he painted his face, and ware his heare after the facion of the MEDES, contrary to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their heare grow after the facion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appeare more ter-F rible to their enemies. For it was on Biblian fide, that one of the winges of the enemies battell was neerest vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe to compaffe them behinde. Whereuppon Craffus some taking thireeene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thow fands were of the men of armes whom duling Cafar fent) and flue hundred thor, with eight enfignes of footemen having targets, most neere to the place where him felfe then was the pur them out in bredth, that wheling about they might going charge spon them that rode vp & downer Butchey feeing him comming, turned fleaight their horse and fled, either bicause they metin a marrisse, or else of purpose to beguite this young Crasses. intifing him thereby as farre from his father as they could. they found the deceit. For the horsemen that fled before them, sodainly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set you them. Whereuppon they stayed, thinking that the enemies perceiving they were fo few, would come and fight with them hande to hande.

Howbeit they fet out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, & inade their raifed fuch a wonderfull dust, that the Romanes could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being thur vp into a litle roome, and standing close one to an other, were fore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguith fight of the

their woundes wider, and so cast them selves away. Many of them dyed thus miserably men tyred and fuch as dyed not, were not able to defend them felues. Then when Publim Conf. praved and befought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horse, they shows him their handes fast nailed to their targets with arrowes, & their feete likewish shot thous and nailed to the ground fo as they could neither flie, nor yet defende them foliuss. There pon him felfeincoraging his horfemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valliantly for upon thenemies. but it was with too great disaduantage, both for offence, and also for defence Rehim felfe and his men with weake & light states, brake apon them that were armed within races of fleeles or fiffe leather tackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrary manner with michie ftrong pykes gaue charge apon these Gavens, which were either marined, or else but light ly armed. Yet those were they in whom Craffus most trusted, having done wonderfull fears a of warte with them. For they received the Pakt HIANS pykes in their handes, & tooke them about the middells, and threw them of their horfe, where they lay on the ground, and could not flurre for the weight of their harnesse : and there were diners of them also that lighting from their horse lav vader their enemies horse bellies, & thrust their swordes into them. The horse flinging & bounding in the aver for very paine threw their maisters under seets, & their enemies one apon an other, & in the end fell dead among them. Moreover, extreame bear and thirst did maruelously comber the GAV LES, who were yied to abide neither of both; and the most parte of their horse were slaine, charging with al their power apon the men at ame of the Pan war and fo rannethem felues in apon the pointes of their pikes. At the length they were driven to reture towardes their footemen, & Publius Craffus among them, who was o very ill by reason of the woundes he had received. And seeing a fand hill by chaunce not fane from them, they went thither, & fetting their horse in the middest of it, compassed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defende them selves the better from the barbarous people: howbeitthey founde it contrary. For the contry being plaine, they in the formest ranckes did somewhat couer them behinde, but they that were behinde, standing hier than they that stoode formest (by reason of the nature of the hill that was hiest in sie middest) could by no meanes faue them selues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miserie and misfortune, that must needes dye without reuence or declaration of their valliancy. At that prefent time there were two GRECIANS about the blim Craffus, Hieronymus, and Nicomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the city of CARRED of Mesopola- they both counselled P. Crassa to steale away with them, and to flie to a city called I schnis that was not farre from thence; and tooke the Romanes parte. But P. aunswered them, that there was no death so cruell as could make him for fake them, that dyed for his fake, When is had so fayd, withing them to faue them selues, he embraced them, & tooke his leave of them and being very fore hure with the shot of an arrow through one of his handes, commanded one of his gentlemen to thrust him through with a sword, & so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Censorinus did the like. But Megabacchus flue him selfe with his owne handes, and so did the most parte of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got up the fand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their speares and pykes, and tooke but fine hundred prisoners. After that, they strake of Publius Crassus head, & therupon returned straight to set apon his father Crassus, who was then in this state. Crassus the father, after he had willed his sonne to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, & purfued the chafe: & perceiuing also that they that remained in their great battell, did not prease apon him so neere as they did be fore, bicause that a great number of them were gone after the other for rescue; he then began to be lively againe, and keeping his men close, retyred with them the best he could by a hills fide, looking euer that his sonne would not be long before that he returned from the chale. But Publius feeing him felfe in daunger, had fent divers messengers to his father, to advertise him of his diftreffe, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and flue by the way: and the last mesfengers he fent, fcaping very hardly, brought Craffus newes, that his fonne was but cast away, F if he did not presently aide him, and that with a great power. These newes were grienous to Craffus in two respectes: first for the searche had, seeing him selfe in daunger to lose all: and

A secondly for the vehement desire he had to goe to his sonnes helpe. Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to goe with all his power, to the reskue of his fonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his fonnes ouerthrow; with a more dredfull noyle and crie of victorie, than ever before: and thereupon their deadly founding drommes filled the ayer with their wonderful noile. The ROMANES then looked straight for a hot allarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publim Craffin head apon the point of a launce, comming neere to the ROMANES, shewed them his head, and asked them in derision. if they knew what house he was of, and who were his parentes: for it is not likely (layd they) that fonoble and valliant a young man, should be the some of so cowardly a father, as Crassine. The fight of Publius Craffus head killed the ROMANES hartes more, than any other daunger s they had bene in at any time in all the battell. For it did not fet their hartes a fire as it should have done, with anger, and defire of revenge: but farre otherwife, made them quake for feare. & ftrooke them starcke dead to behold it. Yet Crassius selfe shewed greater corage in this misfortune, than he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by every band he cried out Crassia oraalowde. The griefe and forrow of this loffe (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only; but sim to his the noble successe and honor of Rome remaineth stil vnuincible, so long as you are yet living his hare was Nowe, if you pitie my losse of so noble and valliant a sonne, my good souldiers, let me in- full of sorous. treate you to turne your forrow into fury : make them deerely buy the ioy, they have gotten: " hereuenged of their cruelty, and let not my misfortune feare you. Our auncesters in olde time lost a thowsande shippes, yea in I-TALLE divers armies and chieftaines for the conquest of Siciliayer for althe loss of them. .. athe length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanguished. For the Empire of Rome came not to that greatnes it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by pacience and constant suffering of trouble and aduersitie, neuer yeeldinge or gening place to any " daunger, Crassus vsing these perswasions to encorage his souldiers for resolution, sounde that " all his wordes wrought none effect : but contrarily, after he had commanded them to gene the showte of battell, he plainely sawe their hartes were done, for that their showter ofe but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other fide, their showtewas great, and lufter lythey range it out. Now when they came to joyne, the PARTHIANS archers horsebacke D compassing in the Romanes apon the winges, shot an infinite nuber of arrowes at their sides. But their men at armes geuing charge apon the front of the Romanus battel with their great launces, compelled them to draw into a narrow rome, a few excepted, that valliantly, and in desperate maner ranne in among them, as men rather desiring so to dye, than to be slaine with their arrowes, where they could do the PARTHIAMS almost no hurt at all. So were they sone diffraction, with the great launces that ranne them through, head, wodde and all, with fuch a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retyre, faying they would geue Craffus that nightes refpic to lament and bewaile his fonnes death: onleffe that otherwise he wifely looking about him. thought it better for his fafety to come and offer him felfe to king Arfaces mercy, then to tary E to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMANES, were in very good hope to overthrow him the next morning. The Romane's on the other fide had amaruelous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dreffe their wounded men, that dyed in miserables there but every man bewayled his hard fortune, when they saw notone of them could estate fif they taried till the morning. On the other side, to departe in the night through that deart, their wounded men did grieue them much. Bicause, to carie them to away, they knew it would let their flight; and yet to leave them to behinde, their pitiefull cries would geue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Nowe; though they all thought Crassus the only author of their misery, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went a side without light, and layed him downe with his head crassus area-F covered, bicaufe he would fee no man, thewing thereby the common forte an example of the man in the state of the state o stable fortune: and the wife men, a good learning to know the frutes of ill counfell, and vaine flavis.

But in the end feeing him to come with forrow, and out of hart, that he had no life nor spirit in him : they them scluesed led the Gaptaines and Centurions together, and fate in counfell for their departure, and fa Graffur flying, agreed that there was no lenger tarying for the. Thus of their owne authoritie at the first the

made the army marche away, without any found of trompet or other noyle, But immediate after, they that were left hurr and ficke, and could not follow, feeing the campe remove. à crying out and tofménting them selves in such sorte, that they filled the whole campe with fortrow, and put them out of all order, with the great mone and lowde lamentation : to asses formest ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruelous feare, thinking they had bene the ene miles that had come and fet apon them. Then turning oft, and fetting them felues in bathl fave, one while loding their beaftes with the wounded men, an other while valoding thems gaine, they were left behinde, fauing three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the city of CARRES. Ignation their Captaine called to the watche on the walles committee Go- and spake in the Latine tongue. Who aunswering, he willed them to tell Copenius, Gouerna of the towne, that Craffer had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and fayd no more neither rold what he was : but rode on still, till he came to the bridge which Crass had made the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Graffus Lieutenauntes, who straved a the night out of the army with four whole enlignes, and having loft his way, gotte to abil where the Part Hears befreged him, flue him & all his company, though he valliantly their The valliant- defended him selfe : yet twenty of them only escaped, who with their swordes drawen in their nes of countie handes, running forward with their heades, thrust in among the thickest of the PARTHIAME They wondering at their desperation, opened of them selves, & suffered the to march onto wards the city of CARRES. In the meane time falle newes was brought to Surena, how Craffe with all the chiefest men of his host was fled, & that the great number that were received into the city of CARRES were men of all forces gathered together, and not a man of any quality of Afraiageame Estimacion. Sureme thereupon thinking he had lost the honor of his victorie, yet standings some doubt of it, bicause he would know the troth, that he might either besiege the citiest CARRES, or purfue after Craffus: fent one of his interpreters to the walles of the city, the ging him to call for Craffin, or Casino, & to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commaunded. Word was brought to Graffus, and he accepted an ! lance. Shortly after also, thither came certaine fouldiers of the ARABIANS from the campi of the PARTHIANS, who knew Graffus and Caffins very well by fight, having divers times fense them in their campe before the battell. Thefe A RABIAN'S feeing Caffew apon the walles, sold him, that Sween was contented to make peace with them, and to let them goe fafely, askin matters good frendes, fo that they would furrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of Pair THIMES handes, and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather thanth be enforced vinto it by extremitie. Cuffins thought this a good offer, and told them, that they

For her the contrarie, was mocked of every bodie, bicause for feare he maintained wicked does by giftes: which perhappes would not have becommed Pericles, nor Ariftides, and yet was met for Nicias, who was borne a timerous natured man, and neuer had corage in him. Whereof

Lycurgus the Orator did vaunte afterwardes to the people, being accused that he redeemed detractours with money: I am glad, fayd he, that having delt thus long in affayers of the state, it is found I have rather geven than taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was thought the better and more civill citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly i- & mage to the goddes, or in making of publicke playes or pastimes to recreate the people. But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small parte of that Crassus bestowed in an open seast he made at Rome: feastings many thowsandes at one time, and did finde and maintaine them also for a certaine time after. backe, at time of neede, to defend his contrie. Wherefore, afterwardes he was compelled a gainst his will to be Generall, to make warres in Sicilia with the Syrac vsans: bicardite people thought he was not fo earnest to disswade the iorney, for that he thought it normal for the common wealth, but bicause through his sloth and cowardlinesse he would make contrie lose sogood an oportunity to conquer Sicile. Yet was this a great testimony of his wicias hone- honesty and trust they had in him: who though he euer hated warre, & did flie from the office of honor and charge in the common wealth, his contriemen notwithstanding did always choose him, as the most experienced persone, and meetest man of the citie. Now Crasties contrarie maner desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but inte warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of an other: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroade in the warres) although he was otherwife of great estimation ! and authoritie. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his frendes that loued him best, thought him (as the comicall Poet fayth)

His ambition notwithstanding & couetous defire of rule, did nothing benefit the Romanes. For the ATHENIANS fent Nicias to the warre against his will : but Crassus led the Romanes thither against their willes. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the common wealth was brought into miferie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, than to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wife man, & a Captaine of gree experience, could neuer fo much as be brought to thinke they should conquer Sight and therfore disswaded his contrymen from the iorney, & would geue no place to the vainchope of the people of ATHENS. But Craffus taking apon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS as though it had bene an easie matter to ouercome them, found him selse deceived, yet didbe aspire to great thinges. For as Iulius Casar had conquered & subdued to the Imperiall crowne of Rome, all the contries of the West partes, to say, the Gavles, the Germaines, and ENGLANDE: euen so did Crassiu desire to goe towardes the East partes, to conquer all to the great west sea of the Indians, and to subdue all the regions of Asia, whereunto Pompeyand Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as euer curteously behaued then felues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like defire that Crassiand For whe the charge of the warres in the East partes was affigned to Pompey, by decree & order of the people: the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it all they could, When news were brought to Rome that Iulius Cafar in battell had ouerthrowen and slaine three hundred thowfand GERMAINES: Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this minde, that Cele should be deliuered into the handes of his enemies whom he had ouercomen, for to be punifined: thereby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrathe of the goddes from Rome, apon him only, that was the vniust breaker of the peace. This notwithstading, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feastes & processions sisteene dayes together, and open facrifices to the goddes with great joy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victory. How glad may we thinke would they have bene, and howe many dayes would they have feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had wrytten from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of Syse, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and provinces to the Empire of Rome?

For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the great in his voyage, for the conquestes he made in the East, and doe dispraise Crassus voyage: doe not well to judge of the beginning, by the cuentes and successed of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploytes. For he ouerthrew his enemies in divers battells, and had almost taken the citie of Syrac vsa: and sure they can

And therefore you must needes accept his sequice that is comen apon your worde: for, the bonde of your promes past you, doth now curofall counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marins was called for : and when he came, thereuided their whole army into three partes, and then beganne to charge apon their enemies of a all handes, for as they obteined victorie. Howebeit Cinna and Marine committed as horrible cruelty in this victory; as could possibly be shewed: infomuch as the ROMANES thoughtal the miseries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, into spect of the great calamities they fell into afterwardes. Nowe Sectorius on thother side neuer caused man to be flaine for any private malice or quarrell he had with any person, neither did he hutte any man when he had ouercomen, but was much offended with Marine infolency & cruell murders : and when he had good oportunity to speake with Cinna a parte, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perswasion. In fine, Servorius feeing Marios garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other fouldiers in this warre, whom he vied as executioners of his flaughter and butchery, alwayers. tending about his person as a garde, and suffering them also to make them selves riche, parly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to spoyle, and partely also with that there violently tooke without his commaundement of their owne mafters, killing them when the had done, rauifning their miftreffes, & defiling their children : he could no lenger abidefuch wickednes and villany, but made them all to be flaine in their campe where they lay together. being no lesse then foure thowsand persones. Afterwardes, when he saw that the elder Merim was deade, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his sonne (against his counsell, and contrary to the lawes of Rome) had by force made him selfe Consult : and that Carbo, Scrpio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercomen by Sylla) were comen out of GRECE to Rome wards, partely through the cowardlines of their Captaines, and partely also bicausen they were betrayed and solde of their owne men : and further, considering therewithall, that his person could doe no good in those affayers, which waxed worse and worse, by meanesof thauthoritie of fuch as had leaft wit and vinderstanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whileft was derhand he wanne his fouldiers from him, notwithstanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly dispairing of Romes prosperity and wellfare, departed from Rome, to go towardes Spayne, thinking that if he could get the first possession and gonernment of that realme, it would at the least be a refuge and receit for all those of their tribe, that should chaunce to be banished out of their contrie. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and paffing through a contry of mountaines, the bar E barous people inhabiting the fame, demaunded tribute of him, for licence to paffe through their territories. Thereat the fouldiers of his company were maruelously offended, laying that it were too much shame and dishonor for a Proconsull of Rome, to pay tribute to vile barba rous people. Notwithstading, Sertorius passed not for the shame they sayd it would to be him, but aunswered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should most recken of, that foireth to haughtie enterprises, and so pleased the barbarous people with money. And thus he made such speede, as he quickely recovered SPAYNE, which he found greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armor. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had bene hardly delt withall before, through the infolency, pride, and couctoufned of the ROMANE Gouernors, whom they ordinarily fent from ROME, and that therefore they hated all manner of gouernment: first of all sought to winne the good willes of all the whole

A and of the common people, by eafing them of their taxe and fubfidies. But that which bred him most loue of all men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of soul- sensite cite diers, and receiuing of any garrifon within their cities, compelling his fouldiers to fet up their taffe to the rentes, and to make their cabines without the suburbes of great cities to winter there, & caufing also his owne pauillion to be first set up, and lay in it him selfe in persone. This norwithflanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauor: for he armed all the ROMANE citizens of age to cary weapon, that dwelt in SPAYNE, and made them make all fortes of engines for battery, and a number of gallies befides, so that he had all the cities at commaundement, being very curteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition. very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderstoode that Sylla kept Rome, and that the a most parte of the tribe of Marius & Carbo was veterly ouerthrowen, mistrusting that it would not be long before they fent some Captaine with a great armie against him: he sent Iulius Salinstor betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with fixe thow lande men well armed. Immediatly after Caius Annius also came thether, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to difresse Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was drive to stay at the soote of the mountaine. notknowing what to determine. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge apon them, & flue numbers of them: infomuch as Sertorius was driven to imbarke againe, and to take his course towardes Spayne, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driven to take certaine pirates botes of the CILICIANS, and to fayle towardes the Ile of Pir yvsa, where he landed in despite of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But The He of fhortly after came Annius thither him felfe with a good number of thippes, and fine rhowfand Pinnia fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by lea, though he had but small barkes, purposely made for swift sayling, & of no strength for fight. But now D the West winderising very bigge, did swell the sea in such forte, that it cast the most parte of Sertorius shippes (being weake and very light) apon rockes in the sea, and him selfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the fea by storme was driven to ride ten daves together at anker, working still for life against the daunger of the surging waves & boisterous windes, which continued rough all that time:yet in the ende when it calmed agains he waied anker, and ranne into certaine desolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hosting faile from thence, he passed the straighte of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hande, landed aponthe coaft of SPAYNE, lying towardes the great Westerne sea, a little about the mouth of theriuer of Bætis, the which falling into the lea Atlanticum, gaue name in olde time to that parte of Spayne, which was called HISPANIA B ETICA. Sertorius hearing reported these Ilandes (vpon a certaine desire now to line quietly out of tyranny & warres) had straigha maruelous minde to go dwel there. But when the pyrates of CILICIA (who were no meno peace, but generaltogether to spoyle & pillage) heard that: they by & by forsooke Sertorine & went into A FRICKE, to restore Assalius the sonne of Iphtha to his realine of MAVRITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre against Ascalius, and all to thend that his fouldiers seeing matter of new hone and meanes to be imployed, should not so leave him, being faced afterwardes to be dischard ged of very necessity. The MAVRVSTANS being very glad of his arrivall, he presently wenten with his enterprise, ouercame Ascalius in battell, and besieged the citie whereinto aponthe ouerthrowe of his armie he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertifed thereof, fent Paccianus thither with an army to aide Afcalius, Sertorius gave him battell, flue him in the field, and wan the rest of his army, which yeelded vnto him: then tooke he the city of Tingis, whereinto Ascalius was fled with his brethren. The LIBYANS Wryte that Anteus is buried there. Bur Ser. Tingis. torius geuing no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that contrie, by reason of the greatnes of the tombe they shewed: made it to be broken open round, and finding therethe Anieusembe body of a man (as they fay) of three score cubits long, he marueled at it, and so finishing his and greamer. facrifice to honor the memory thereof, caused the tombe to be well closed up againe. By this act hee did greatly increase the honor of Anteus memory, which the city did vnto him, and thereby confirmed the contry mens reporte of Antaus. For the Ting ians doe reporte, that after Antens death, his wife Tinga lav with Hercules; and had a goodly sonne by him called Sephax, who was king of that contrie, and there built this city, geuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is fayd also that this Sophax had a sonne called Diodorus, who conquered the most parte of Africke with an army of the GRECIAN OLDIANIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thether, to inhabite those partes. We were willing to imbrace the occasion offered vs to speake of this matter as we went, for the honor of Iuba, the noblest historiographer that euer came of royall blood: for it is thought his auncesters were lineally discended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as conquerour now, having the whole contry in fub. It iection, did in no wife hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put trust in him, but restored them their goodes, cities, and gouernment againe, contenting him felfe with that they offered him of their good willes. But then standing doubtfull what way to determine: the L v sit anians fent Ambassadors vnto him, to intreate him to be their chiefetaine. For they stoode in great neede of a worthy personage, and a man expert in warres to defende them against the suries the ROMANES: and therefore they only trusted him, hearing of his honorable behaifiour by ans to be their them that were conversaunt with him. Whose qualities as we finde wrytten, were these. He Captaine. tues and qua was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a resolute man without fearein most daunger, so was he most temperate in greatest prosperitie. In valliantnes inserior to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in euery imminent daunger. For where E any present exployt was to be done, any strong place of advantage to lodge or fight in tobe taken, or that he was to passe ouer any river, or scape any instant daunger, where it stoode a pon speedy execution, and to shew some stratageame or policie in time and place to suppliant the enemie: in those matters he passingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good feruice, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithstanding, the fowle murder he did in his latter dayes apon certaine younge children that were pledges with him (which doutleffe was an act of great cruelty and anger that could not forgene) doth manifestlie proue, that he was neither mercifull nor curteous of nature: but that he manie times did finely counterfeat it, when both the time and the warres did so require it. Butter mine opinion, fure I am perswaded that no missortune can have power to make persite !! vertue, grounded vpon good reason, to worke in any sorte contrarie to it selfe: neither doe! thinke it impossible also, but that mens good willes and gentle natures being injured without a caule, may peraduenture chaunge their naturall dispositions. Which then proued true in Settorius, who finding fortune contrary vnto him, & his good happe chaunged into ill grewe fo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villa noully betraied him. But now to our matter where we left, Sertorius departed our of A FRICKE apon the Lusitanians offer, who chose him for their General, geuing him absolute power and authoritie: and so soone as he arrived, he straight leavied men of warre, and with them fuldued the people of SPAYNE fronting apon their marches, of which the more parte did willingly submit them selues, apon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and curteous. anda valliant man besides in present daunger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuises & sut

relies to winne their good willes : as amonge others, the policie and denife he had of the Savorim faiteines to white their good white was a poore man of the contrie called Spanier, who meeting whole, which was this. There was a poore man of the contrie called Spanier, who meeting whole. by chaunce one day with a hynde in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters: helet the damme goe not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young hynde, and of a straunge heare, for she was all milke white. It chaunced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those partes, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him fuch maner of presentes: as frutes, fowle, or venison, & would make very much of them that brought them to him, and also reward them well for the same. So, this poore man prefented Sertorius with his younge hynde, which he gladly received, and which with time he made so tame, that the would come to him when he called her, and followe him where ever hewent, being nothing the wilder, for the dayly fight of fuch a number of armed fouldiers to-C gether as they were, nor yet afrayed of the noyle and tumult of the campe. Infomuch as Serbrins by litle & litle made it a miracle, making the simple barbarous people below that it was agift that Diana had fent him, by the which the made him understande of many and fundrie things to come: knowing wel enough of him felfe, that the barbarous people were men eafily deceived, and quickely caught by any subtill superstition, besides that by arte also he brought them to beleue it as a thinge very true. For when he had any fecret intelligence genen him, that the enemies would inuade some parte of the contries and prouinces subject vitto him, or that they had taken any of his fortes from him by any intelligence or fodaine attempt: he fraight told them that his hynde spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arme hismen, and put him felfe in strength. In like maner if he had heard any newes that one of his n Lieutenauntes had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the meffenger, and bring his hynde abroade with a garland and coller of no fegaves: and then say it was a token of some good newes comming towardes him, perswading them with all to be of good cheare, and so did facrifice to the goodes, to gene them thankes for the good tidings he should heare before it were long. Thus by putting this superstituto into their heades, hemade them the more tractable and obedient to his will, infomuch as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a straunger wifer than them selues, but were stedsastiv perwaded that they were rather led by some certaine god : and so much the more; bleaule that his deedes confirmed their opinions, seeing his power so dayly to increase beyonde the hopeand expectation of man. for one of the most expert men of warre, and chiefest Captaines among the ROMANES thin 1 he put alfo so of to diffresse that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAVLE NARBOWN. 515 (now Languedocke) to aide. And they were furthermore driven to sende Pompey the great with all speede from Rome, with a new army. Bicause Metellus knew not what course to be hauing to fight with a most valliant man, & one whom he could neuer either bring to any to battell, nor yet entrappe in the plaine fielde, (so easily could he cast him selse into all kinden formes) by reason of the dexterity and swiftnes of his spanishe souldiers being lightly armed Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote, and to lead an army heavy armed, which could kepe their ranckes, and fighting steadely coulde. taken we was the control of the cont mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with these menamed as light as the winde, and to pursue them in chase that fled still, and neuer kept place; it was vnpoffible for them to doe it, and much leffe to abide hunger and thirst, to line without

was neuer geuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and our of warres, he was likewise acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer so litle leasure, he would continually be on horsebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fieldes, which made him very ready and expert to know how to winde him selfe out of daunger when he was distressed, and contrain lyalso to compasse in his enemy apon any aduantage: and besides, to see where he mighten ter, and where not. For this cause was Metellus driven (who was still desirous to fight) to abide the losses and discommodities which they suffer that be vanquished: and Sertorius on thother fide refuting battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they have, which chase their enemies whome they have ouercomen. For he cutte of his vittells on every fide. tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to marche further forwarde, Sertorius stayed him. And when he lay still in his campe, Sertorius came and gaugh him alaroms, & draue him to dislodge. Yf Metellus layed fiege to any place, Sertorius straight befieged him for want of vittells. So that his fouldiers were euen weary of altogether. Where uppon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: oh, well fayd, cryed all the fouldiers, let Captaine fight against Captaine, and ROMANE against a ROMANE. Howbeit Metellus refused him, and the souldiers laughed him to scorne. Neuerthelesse he did but smyless them, and therin shewed him selfe a wife man: for as Theophrastus sayth, a Captaine must dye Menellus pra- as a Captaine, not like a private fouldier. Furthermore, Metellus confidering that the Lan-Hifth to be- GOBRITES (who gaue great aide vnto Sertorius in all feruices) were easie to be taken for lacke of water (hauing but one onely well in all their city) and that who foeuer did befrege the fame. should straight be master of all the spring heades of the suburbes about it, hoping thereby & E to take their city, for lacke make the citie veelde vnto him within two dayes at thutmost : he commaunded his fouldiers to vittell them selues for fine dayes only. But Sertorius having intelligence thereof, gaue good direction and speedy order to preuent him. For he caused two thowsand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and promifed rounde fummes of money for every skinne brought thether, Many Spanyards and May By Stans straight tooke apon them thenterprise. Thereuppon Sertorius choolinge the lustiest menamonge them, sent them away through the mountains commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water you the citizens, they should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might last them the lenger which defended the city. Metellus receiving advertisement hereof, was much agricued withall, bicause his souldiers vittells were wel nere spent, which they had I brought according to his commandement : and therefore he fent Aquinus one of his Leite tenauntes, with fix thow fand men to get vittells. Sertorius having intelligence of his purpole, a prefently layed an ambush for his returne in a valley full of woodde, and bestowed there three howlande men to fet uppon the rereward, whileft he him felfe gaue charge on the voward This made he Aquinus flie, flue the most parte of his men, and tooke the rest prisoners, How- sensite . beit Aquinus felfe the Captaine having loft his weapons and horfe, by flying to enered when wenters Awho thereuppon was driven with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the SPANYARD S. For these valliant deedes, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honored of all the barbarous people, and specially bicause he had made them good souldiers, brought them from their former rude & beaftly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the Ro-

MANE facion, to kepe their ranckes when they fought, to follow their enfigne, and to take the figuall and word of the battell; infomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly army, well a raught and trained, being before a confused multitude of theeues and tobbers. Furthermore. he desided great store of gold and silver among them, shewing them how they should gilde Semerita he defined great force of gold and mater among them, the mag trees with fine workemanshippe, and also some distributions of the state o brauely apparell them selves with riche clokes and sleuelesse cassockes apon their armor, maner of the reaching them to be fine, and furnishing them with money, whereby he maruelously wanne Romania. the heartes of the barbarous people. Yet did he further binde them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children. For he fent generally for all the noble mens young fonnes, through all the contries and prouinces subject vnto him : and brought them to the goodly citie of O seat The citie of where he provided them of schoolemasters to teache them the Greeke and Latine tongue: ofca. hearing their parentes in hande, that it was to no other ende, but to make them (when they Came to be men) meete to be imployed in the service of the common weale, albeit in deede itwas but a fine deuise of him, to have them as Oftages for their faith and loyaltic towardes striction faith him. Then were the fathers of these children glad men to see their sonne's apparelled like Ro- 111 por WANDS, in fayer long gownes garded with purple, to goe civilly to the schooles: that Serter rise payed for their learninge : and that oftentimes he went thither to appose them, to see how they profited : and how he gaue rewardes vnto them that were the best schollers, hanging juells about their neckes, which the Romanes call Bulla. Infomuch, that they having a cultome at that time in Spaine, that such as were about the Prince or their chieftaine should die with him when he dyed, that custome of voluntarie vowe to dye with their Lorde, being called by the barbarous people, denotion: there were very fewe of their followers and family The Span Il liarsahat would vowe to dye with other Captaines, but on thother fide, thow landes commonly followed Sertorius, having vowed to loofe their lines with him. And for proofe hereof

is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowen by a certaine citie of SPATHE, The Spanthe enemies egerly pursuing him: the SPANYARDS not regarding their owne lives to faue his, serioring. tooke him vp on their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man apon them, till they put him into the city, who being fafe & out of daunger, they then looked by running to fane them selves the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not only beloued of the SPANY AND S, but of or therfouldiers alfo that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the fame fa- Persenna dion, arrived in Spayne full of money, &with a good number of fouldiers, intending to make inned with watte in his behalfe against Metellus: his fouldiers fell out with him, and had none other ralke E inhiscampe but of Sertorius. The which spited Perpenna to the hart, being prowde & stately by meanes of his wealth and estate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pompywas past ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the fouldiers armed them selues, and plucked up their enlignes that were fast in the ground, and cried out apon Perpenna to lead them to Sertoriss, threatning him that if he would not, they would leave him alone, and seeke them a Captaine, that could both faue him felfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to followe their mindes; and to leade the three and fiftie enfignes he had with him; to joyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius army very great, and specially after all the cities on this fide the river of Ebrus had yeelded vitto him. For then came fouldiers to him out of all partes: Ebrus fi.

howebeit they were a rashe confused multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no rea-

F formor pacience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to fer apon their enemies. This trou-rection, as they should not veterly be walt away, hoping after that to have them the more bedientvnto him. And in deede they had their payment as he contectured: notwithflanding

perplexitie from them, which this ouerthrow perhappes had striken into them: immediate after he caused his whole armie to assemble, as purposing to vie some speeche vnto themse which time he caused two horses to be brought and set in the middes among them, thorses oldeand feeble iade, and thother a goodly luftie horfe, which befides other things, had a man uelous fayer thicke taile. Behinde the old leane iade, he fet a lufty tall fellow : and behindere goodly horse also, he placed a little wearish man, & seeming to fight to have but small strength Now apon a figne genen them which he had made them priny to, the strong man tookethe leane horse by the taile with all his might, as if he would have pluckt it of by the stumpe; and the other wearish man fell to plucking of heare by heare from the great horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and swet a great while in vaine at the leane horse taile, thinkings have pulled it of, and in thende did nothing elfe but make the lookers on laugh: and that the wearish wretch on thother fide in a shorte space, (& at ease) had left the great horse taile with neuer a heare on it: Sertorius then riling vp, spake in this forte to his souldiers. Doe ye not fee (my frendes and companions) fayd he, how time and perfeuerance exceedeth force? and the thinges valikely at the first to be ouercome by force, are yet in time, by litle and litle obtained For continuance ouercommethall thinges, and there is no force nor power, but proceffed of time confumeth and bringeth to nought, being a most certaine helpe to them, that can take oportunity, and abide time: as in contrariwise hast and rashnes is as daungerous an enemy may be, to them that doe thinges of a head without regard. By these common deuises where with Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportuni tie of time. But of all the stratageames he vied in warre, that only exceeded al other, which he shewed vnto a people called the Characit anians. The people doe dwell on the other fide of the riner of Tagus, and have neither cities nor villages for their common abode, but only great high hill, full of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towardes the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great flimie ground and fo rotten, thatis is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crummeth like white lyme, & turneth todal !! under his feete. And therefore, by meanes of the same, when those people were afrayed of any enemies, or that they had conueyed the goodes they had robbed & stollen from their neighbors into those caues, they thought them selues safe, if they were once gotten into them; for it was vnpoffible to compell them to come out. Nowe it chaunced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which these barbarous people inhabited who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrowen him. But Sertorius beingin a rage with them, and bicause he would show that he fled not : tooke his horse backe the new morning, and rode as necre to the hill as he coulde, to viewe the nature and scituacion of the place: and when he faw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, and walked vpane downe, vainely threatning them to no purpose. Yet going and comming to and fro, hopes if ceiued the winderaifed a great dust, of that britle earth we have spoken of, and caried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof as we fayd before, lay full aponthe North. This Northen winde, which some call Cacias, is the only winde of all other that most keepeth in that quarter, and rifeth from the moores and mountaines thereaboutes, which be continually contered with fnow, and then in the hart of fommer is nourished and inforced by the melting of the ice and inow, and so bloweth a joly coole winde, which refresher the batbarous people and beaftes all the day long. Sertorius marking this with him felfe, and understanding by the inhabitants therabouts, that this winde blew commonly among them: com athie against maunded his fouldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light britle earth together, & toraile people, called a mount of it, right against the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockery of itatible ! first, thinking Sertorius would have made a mount to have fought with them apon it howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his fouldiers backe againe into

SERTORIVS A his campe. The next morning by breake of day there was a prery little windo flarrings that one whilewof the toppe of his forced mount, & the highest parte of that masse of earth, as chasse sheathey winnowe corne : and as the diane beganne to have any power, the North winds alo noic, which soorthwith filled all the hill with dust. And withall, came Sertment foilstiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before and brake all those drie clots of clay in peeces. The horsemen persporter fide, they fill manded ged their horfestpand downe in it, to raife up the greater dult; which the winde carried as foone as it meandblew into the caues of these barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes additions of the tockes. So they having no other ventes not ayer any way, but there where thowarde blew in apon them : it did to blindefolde their eyes, and filled their caues with fuch ahotte stuffing ayer, that they were almost choked with all, not able to take breath. For when they should drawe their breathes, this stuffing ayer and dust came in at their mouthes so fast, dathey had much a docto hold out two dayes, and on the thirde yeelded them felues who Separation mercy: the which thing did not formuch increase his power, as it wanne him honor, bepolicie to haue wonne fuch an villikely conquest, which by force could neuer haue bene and where to fight was matter impossible. So longe therefore as ho made warre with Entrellus alone, tie commonly had the advantage of him, bicaufe Metellus was an olde man and heavy, & could not relift sectories lufty youth, that led a light army, like rather to a compunyof thecues and robbers; than to an army of men of warre. But afterwardes when Pomper Security was some ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them being encamped eche hefore gainst other, and that Pompey had shewed him all the stratageaines and policies of warre possible soo 1800d Captaine to deuile, & he the like ento Pompey: and found that Sertorius had the better ohimboth in laying his ambuthes, & allo in forefeeing to intrappe him then grew the fame of Senterius to be fo great, that even in Rous it felfe he was thought to be the noblest Cand mine Scot best conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame andreputacion, which afterwardes also waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla; who game him the furname of Pompey the great, for that he had deferued honor of triumphe. before his beard was growen. So, when he was comen thus into SPAYNE, divers townes and cuies subject vnto Sertorius, were halfe in minde to yeelde vnto Pompey: but afterwardes they therebagaine, apon the channee that happened vnto the citie of Lav non, beyond all expedanon. For Sertoreus being gone to lay fiege to it, Pompey in halt went thither with his armie Sertorius gomillethe fiege. Neere vnto the city there was a little hill very commodious to lodge a campe tho las fiege in and allo to diffice them of the citie; whereupon thone made haft to get it, and thother to kepehim from it. Notwithstanding, Servorius was the first man, and got the hill: and Pompey. came cuen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had so fallen out, thinking to have made Sentitus fure at that time, being kept in on the one fide with the citie of LAVRON, and with his army on the other. Thereupon he sent vnto the citizens, and bad them care for nothing. more then to stand apon their walles at their pleasure, to see Sertorius straightly besieged, who thought to have befreged them. This meffage being brought to Sertorius, he imyled at it, and fayd, that he would teache Syllaes younge scholler (for so in mockerie he called Pompey) that awifeCaptaine should rather see behinde then before him: and therewithall he shewed the serior has we-LAVRONITANS fixe thow lande footemen well armed, which he had left in his campe when thy faying of hecame to take the hill where he was, to thend that if Pompey came by chauncesto affaile him. they should geue a charge apon his rereward. Pompey havinge founde this too lare, durit not offer Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaffed in behinder and on thother side he was ashamed toforfake the LAVRONITANS, whome he was driven in thende to fee viterly faryled and defroyed before his eyes, and durit not once sturre to helpe them. The barbarous pleof the contrarie parte feeinge no hope of aide by him, yeelded straight vnto Seriorini, who did not onely pardon them, but also suffered them to goe whether they would. Howbeit he burntshe citie, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer flewed crueltie in anger) butto Serioliu hame Pompey withall, and to stoppe their mouthes that made such accomps of him and that: burns the city this brute might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey him felle being prefern; and Pompey might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly city of his confederates, figure neither durft nor could helpe them. In deede Sertorius in continuance of this water from much loffe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieuxenaum as touching him selfe, he was neuer ouerthroven, nor those he led . And yet he custiment more honor in recourring of those battels which his Captaines lost, than his enemics and had our them to the worfe. As in the battell he wanne against Pompey, by the city of Swing and in an other he wanne against Pampey and Metellus both, by the citie of Tv. Triangles for the ouerthrow of Svcnon, it is thought it came through Fompeyer ambition, making more half for feare Metellus should be partaker of the honor of his victorie: and that wash thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him, and therefore fought the battell with Pampey towardes night, supposing the darkenesse of the night work trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to faue them felues if they were ouercome, and alfou

When both battells came to geue charge, Sertorius at the firm not directly against Pompey, but against Afranius, who led the left wing of Pompeyer band and him felfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howebeit Sertorine being adjumited that the left wing of his owne army against the which Pompey fought, was in such diffrestern they gaue backe, and could abide no lenger, if they were not prefently aided: ftraightlefte leading of the right wing, which he affigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and rannersh all speede possible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as slying. And firsthere thered them together agains which had turned their backes, and after put those also ingo order that were yet a fighting: and so having encoraged them both with his wordes, and the presence of his person, he gauca new charge againe apon Pompey, more coragiously thanks. fore, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chafing (uch as fled) and care fo fiercely apon him, that he put all the whole army of the ROMANES to flight: infomptha Pompey him selfe escaped killing in the field very hardly being fore hurt, & faued by a strange

But receiving intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he founded the retreate, and diflodged from the place he encamped, faving : had not that old woman comen, I would have whipped that young boy to Rome with roddes. Now was Setorius very heavy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynde: for there by all his futtelrie and finesse to kepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then specially, when they stoode in neede of most comforte. But by good happe, certained his fouldiers that had loft them felues in the night, met with the hynde in their way, and knot wing her by her colour, tooke her, and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her promifed the a good reward, so that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be fecretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroade among them, and with a pleafaunt countenaunce tolde the noble men and chiefe Captaines of these barbarous people, how the goddes had reuealed it to him in his dreams, that he should shortly have a maruelous good thing happen to him: and with these words fate downe in his chayer to gene audience. Whereuppon they that kept the hynde not fare from thence, did fecretly let her goe. The hynde being lofe, when the had fpied Sertorius, ran straight to his chayer with great joy, and put her head betwext his legges, & layed her mouth in his right hande, as the before was wont to doe. Sertorius also made very much of her, and of purpose appeared maruelous glad, shewinge such tender affection to the hynde, as it see med the water stoode in his eyes for ioy. The barbarous people that stoode there by & beheld

Another time having straighted his enemies with scarcety of vittells, in the territorie of the SEGVETINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they fent great mounes of men to forrage the contrie, to get vittells. Apon thencounter it was valliantly Service flue fought of either fide, where Memmius was flaine, (the valliantest Captaine Pompey had)coragiously fighting in the middelt of the battell. Sertorius finding him felfe the stronger followed Linearing his first wing, making great slaughter of those that withstoode him, vntill he came vnto Med tellus felfe, who taried his comming, defending him felfe more valliantly than was either how ped, or looked for, in a man of his yeares: infomuch as he was at the laft hurt with a partifan. Which was fuch a dishonor to the ROMANES, not vnto them only that faw it, but vnto fuch allo as heard of it, that being all ashamed to for sake their Captaine, and turning their shame shame more into anger against their enemies: they covered Metellus rounde about with their shieldes and targets, & getting him out of the presse and furie of the fight, gaue such a fierce onset, as they draue the Spanyard s to flie. Thus fortune chaunging the victory, Sertorias to gene his feat-tered men time to faue them selves, and leasure also for a new supply (which he caused to be presently leaused) to come at their pleasure: fled of purpose into a citie of the mountaines of Chrong scituation, and there setting a good face of the matter repayred the rampers, and fortified the gates, thinking nothing leffe then to abide there to be befreged, but only to lay a baite seriorius bifor his enemies, comming to befrege the citie, hoping they should eafily winne it, and in the fieged of meane time left pursuing of the barbarous people which had therby good leafure given them to faue them felues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppresse the new supplie that was comming to Sertorius, who had fent out his Captaines to the next cities & thieres adioyning, to leauie men, with expresse commaundement, that when they had mustered a convenient number together, they should sende them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderstoode of their comming, he eafily passed through his enemies to meete them, and with them sodainweame backe againe, and harried his enemies worfe then before: fomtime cutting their vit-I) tells from them by land, through his ambushes and continuall suttle policies, being quickely in energie place whether they thought to go, with his light army; and on the fea also with cermine pirats pinnefes, with the which he scoored all the coast apon the sea side. Pompey: bicause he had through his valliancy and great skill brought two of the most famous E Captaines of their time, to great extreamitie and diffresse. Then did Metellus showe howe Metellus feemuch he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemie. For he pro- red Sertorius, claimed by founde of trompet, that if any Romane could kill him, he would gene him an hundred filture talentes, and twentie thow fand I ugera of land; and if he were a banished many he promifed he should be restored to his contry and goodes againe, buying his death by trea-

When doubtlesse he deserved to be laughed at, shewing himselfe so much caried away with joyant vaine glory, for one ouerthrowe geuen vnto him, whom him felfe was wont to call syllering gitine, and the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On thother fide, Sertorius noble corae was eafily discerned, first, for that he called the banished men which were escaped fro Rous and comen to him, Senators : and having them about him, called them the Senate, making some of them Treasorers, others Pretors, directing and ordering all thinges according to the manner of his contrie. And in this also, that making warres with the souldiers of the cities of SPAYNE, and defraying the same at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, so much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with Romans officers and Captaines: faving full, that he fought for the liberty of the people of Rome, and notto increase the gloriean armes aside, and to live at home like a private man, so that he might be lawfully restored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meanest citizen in Rome, then fellion to his being a banished man out of his contry, to be called Emperor of the world. And it is faid the one of the chiefest causes which made him desire so much to be called home againe, was the

death) upon whom he cast all his loue and delite: insomuch as after that his frends in Spane had fent for him to come to be their Captaine, and that he had bene a while among them.receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it fo strake him to the hart, that he had almost dyed for forrowe. For he lay seuen dayes together continually on the grounde weeping, & neuer gaue his fouldiers the watch word, nor would be seene of any of his frends vntil that the other noble men and Captaines of his owne estate, came to him to his tent and were so importunate of him by intreaty and perswasson, that they gotte him out of his tento shew him selfe to his souldiers, to speake to them, & to take order for his affayres which prospered very well. By these signes many haue judged, that he was of a curteous and pityfullna-D ture, and that naturally he was genen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessity to take charge of men of warre, bicause he coulde not otherwise line quietly not fafely, being pursued by his enemies, which would neuer let him rest, and thereuppon ented into warre, for his owne gard and lafety. The treaty selfe he made with king Mithridate, asgued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whome Sylla had ouercomen, was recouerdagaine (like a wrestler that being ouerthrowen getteth vp on his feete to trye an other fall with his enemy) and tooke apon him to inuade As IA: Sertorius fame was then fo great, that he was spoken of through the world, by marchauntes comming from the West, who blew abroade the reporte therof al the East partes ouer, even into the realme of Pont, like to marchandises which they went to feeke for in straunge contries. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded E by the vaine vauntes of his fauored courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and him felfe vnto king Pyrrus, faying that the Romanes being fet apon by them both could not with stand two such excellent natures, & great powers together, when the noblest Captaine of the world should be joyned with the greatest and most pursant Prince that euerwas: sent thereupon his Ambassadors into Spayne vnto Sertorius, with full power and commission to promife him money and shippes towards the maintenaunce and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he defired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the possession of Asia again, the which he had furrendred up unto the Romanes apon the peace made between him and Salla. Sertorius hereupon called his counsell together (which he termed the Senate) to consult apon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mithridates offers, F and were exceedingly glad of the same, considering that they asked them nothing but a title in the aver, and a name of things which were not in their power, offring them therfore things he brought up at schoole in the city of O sca : for some of them he put to death, and other a he folde as flaues. Thus Perpenna having many affociates in his wicked conspiracie against of Priprina Sectorius, brought into his confederacie also one called Manlius, who had chiefest chargein observations all the army. This Manlines loued a young boy exceedingly, & bicause he would let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plat of this conspiracy, willing him notes reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him only: for he should see him a green man before it were longe. The younge boy louinge an other better than him, called Aufling went & reuealed vnto him all that Manlins had told him. Aufidius marueled to heare the how made prinie to it, feeing him felfe also was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that confederacie, lim was one of them. And when the boy also named Perpenna, Gracium, & some other whom Aufidius knew well to be of cousell, he was worse afrayed then before, but yet seemed to make a litle of it, and solde the boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counselled him not to credit Manlius wordes, who was but a vaine man, and boafted of that which was not true, and didir onely but to deceive him. This notwithstanding, departing thence, he went foorthwith who

Perpenna, and tolde him how their practife was discouered, declaring further what danner they were in, if it were not speedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he favd, & thereupon they deuised this treason. They had suborned a messenger to bring counterfeate letters to Sertorius, feyning in the same that one of his Lieutenauntes had wona great battell, in the which he had flaine a maruelous number of his enemies. Sertorius beine very glad of the good newes, made facrifice vnto the goddes to geue them thankes. Where upon, Perpenna taking the present oportunity inuited Sersorius to Supper to him, and allother his frendes that were present (enery one of the conspiracie with him) and was so importunate

Whereuppon Sertorius. whether it was that he coulde not abide to see those villanous partes, or that he mistrusted their ill will towardes him by fumbling of their wordes in their mouthes, and by their vnwonted irreuerent maner shewed vnto him: fell backewards apon the bed where he sate at mess, I feeming no more to marke what they did or fayd. Perpenna at that instant tooke a cuppeful Therewithall Antonius that fate about Sertorius at the table, stabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thrust, strouew rise: but the traiterous murderer got vp on Sertorius brest, & held both his handes. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murdered, not able to defend him felfe, all the conspirators falling apon him. Sertorius death being blowen abroade, the most parte of the Spanyards fent Ambastadors immediatly vnto Pompey and Metellus, and yeelded them felues vnto them: and Perperna with those that remained with him, attempted to doe some thing with Sertorius army and preparation. But all fell out to his vtter destruction and ruine, making the world know that he ! was a wicked man, who could neither commaund, nor knew how to obey. For he went to affaile Pompey, who had ouerthrowen him straight, and was in the end taken prisoner. And yet in that instant of his calamitie, he did not vie him selfe like a valliant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to faue his life, having Sertorius letters and wrytinges, he offered Pompey to deliuer him all Sertorius letters fent him from the chiefest Senators of Rome, wryt-

ten with their owne handes, requestinge Sectorius to bring his armie into ITALIB, where he should finde numbers of people desirous of his comming, and that gaped still for chaunge of gouernment. But here did Pompey shewe him selfe a graue and no younge man, deliuening Serverine ringe thereby the citie of Rome from great feare and daunger of chaunge and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and wrytinges on a heape together, and burnt them enery one, F without readinge any of them, or fufferinge them to be red. And moreouer, he presently put Perpenna to death, fearing he should name some, which if they were named, would breed Pompey.

new occasion of trouble & sedition. And as for the other conspirators, some of the afterwards were brought to Pompey, who put them all to death : and the rest of them fled into AFRICER where they were all ouerthrowen by them of the contrie, and not a man of them scaped, but fell ynfortunately apon thedge of the sworde, Sufidius only except, Manlius companion in laue. E with him. But fure their reporte feemeth trueft, which wryte that Philippe did aduaunce him Macedon. for the loue he bare to his father, in whose house he had lodged. After the death of Philippe, Eumenes continued his feruice with king Alexander his sonne, where he was thought as wise a man, & as faithfull to his mafter, as any: and though he was called the Chaunceller or chiefe fecretary, yet the king did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefest frendes & familiars. For he was fent his Lieutenaunt generall of his whole army, against the Indians, and was Perdice as fucceffor in the gouernment of his province, Perdice as being preferred vnto Hephastions charge after his death. Nowe bicause Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the body vnto the king) after the death of Alexander told the Lordes of the counscil of Macedon, that he had served the king with his shield and speare, and howe Eumenes

F had followed with his penne and paper: the Lordes laughed him to fcorne, knowing that befides many great honors Eumenes had received, the king effeemed fo well of him, that he did him the honor by mariage to make him his kinfeman. For the first Lady that Alexander knew HHH iii in A s 1 A, was Barfine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a fonne, & called his name Heren A les: & of two of her fifters he maried the one of them called Apamavnto Ptolomye, & her other fifter also called Barline, he bestowed upon Eumenes, when he distributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lordes and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fellin disgrace with king Alexander, & stoode in some daunger by meanes of Hephastion. For Hepha flion following Alexanders courte on a time, having appointed Eurus a phiphe player alod ging, which Eumenes servauntes had taken up for their maister: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a ma were better be a phiphe & a common plaier of Tragedies, then a fouldier, fithence fuch kinde of people were preferred before men of service that ventured their lives in the warres. Alexander at that present time was as angrie as Eumenes, & roundly tooke vp Hephastion for it howbeit immediatly after having chaunged his minde, he was much offended with Eumenes, bicause he thought him not to haue vsed that franke speech so much against Hephastion, as of a certaine presumptuous boldenes towarder him selfe. And at an other time also, when Alexander was sending Nearchus with his army by fea to cleere the coastes of the Occean, it chaunsed the king was without money: whereupon he sent to all his frendes to take vp money in prest, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred talentes. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and sayd he had much a doe to get him so much of all his tenantes. Alexander sayd nothing to him, neither would he suffer them to take his hundred talentes: but commaunded his officers to set Eumenes ten a fire, bicause he would take him tardy with a lye, before he could gene order to cary away his gold and filuer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make this to faue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwardes, and was force it was burnt, bicause all his letters and wrytinges were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched they found in niggots of gold and filuer mingled together, aboue a thowfand talentes, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away : but more then that, he sent vnto all his Lieutenauntes, Captaines, and Gouernors of contries, wherefocuer they were, that they should fend him copies of all the letters which they before had sent vnto him, bicause all those which hehad were burnt, and commaunded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hepheflion fell at variance againe, by reason of a gifte that was geuen him, infomuch as very sowle wordes passed betwext Hephastion and him : yet did not the king geue Eumenes any ill countenaunce at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hephastion was dead, the king taking his D death grieuously whom he loued so derely, gaue no good countenaunce (and was very briefe befides)vnto those whom he knew bare any grudge vnto Hephaltion whiles he lived, & thathe. thought were glad of his death, but specially vnto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephaltion was knowen to him well enough: infomuch as he would ofte twyt him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offred Hephaftion. But Eumenes being very wife, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the selfe same meane that did him hurte: and deuised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honor Hephastions funerall with all pompe possible) newe inventions to set forth the same, of more magnificence then had before bene feene, sparing for no cost, laying on money bountifully, to make him a rich and stately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betweet the MACEDONIAN E footemen, and the noble men that had bene neerest about him : and in that quarrell, Eumener in good will stucke to the Lordes, but in wordes he seemed a newter and frend to both partes faying, it was not for him being a straunger to thrust him selfe into the quarrells of the Ma-CEDONIANS. And when the other Lordes were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behinde pacified the greatest parte of the fouldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lordes. Whereupon, after the Lordes and Captaines had confulted together, and taken order for those contentions, they deuided the gouernment of the prouinces amonge them which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coast vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZ VNTE, the which at that time was not subject to Thempire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept in then as F king. Howbeit it was fayd, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in possession of it, with

And Leonatus also came downganto Para volta, and vndermoke the iorney of this conquest for Eumenes sake, But when he was in iorney thitherwardes, Hecatam, tyran of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, & prayed him rather to goe helpe Antipater and the other MACED ONIANS, which were befreged in the citie of LAMAIA. So Leonatus being willing to take fea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it and to reconcile him with Hecateus: for they were not frendes one with an other by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecataus, about the government of their citie. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto king Alexander, saying, that he was a tyranne, and befought the kinge that it woulde please him to sette the Car-DIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refusing that iorney against the GRACIANS, alleaging that he was afrayed of Antipater, who had bene his enemy of long time, doubting that for the olde grudge he bare him, & also to gratifie Hecataus, he would put him to death : Leonatus then revealed him felfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would naffe ouer the fea to ayde Antipater, where in deede his meaning was to take the kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him letters sent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of P B L L A, and there the would marry him. When Eumenes was made privy to his purpose : either bicause he feared Antipater, or els for that he had no great good opinion of Legiatus, knowing him to be a fonde man, and very rathe and vinconstant in his doinges, he staleaway from him by night, with those fewe men he had being about three hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the fumme of fine thow fand talentes, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereuppon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counfell. Shortly after, Perdiceas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with 2 great armie which he him felfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken prisoner, and Eumenes established Gouernor of the contrie, who delivered the charge of the great cities vnto his frendes, and left them there Captaines of garrisons which he appointed, placing euery where. Judges, Receivers, Governors, and all luch other officers necessarie as he thought meete. Perdice as medling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdice as againe, as well to wayte apon him, as also bicause he would euer be about the kinges. But Perdice as thinking with him selfe that he alone could wel enough performe thenterprise he went about, and confidering also that the realme heleft behinde him stoode needefull of a wife and skilfull Gouernor, whom he might trust with the safety of his state: when they were in CILIcinreturned Eumenes backe againe, under colour to fend him to his gouernment, but in dede tokeepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined apon the fronters of his contrie whereof he was Gouernor, bicause Neoptolemus did vnder hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a prowde and infolent person, yet Eumenes still deuised to hold him in, and kept him from attemptes, by gentle and fayer wordes. Furthermore, perceiuing also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footemen were growen exceeding stows &insolent: he for a strength & defense against them, set vp a copany of horsemen. & to bring it to passe, released all the contriemen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to serue a horsebacke, and bought a great number of horse of service, which he gaue amongs them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them coragious, by honors and giftes he gaue to them that ferued well, and so by continual exercise and often remouing them from place to place, made them very ready and feruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACED ON, some much amazed, some others very glad when they sawe howe by this diligence Eumenes had in fo shorte a time gotten about him such a number, as sixe thowfand three hundred horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus having subdued the GRECIAN S, came on with their army into A SIA to ouerthrow Perdice as greatnes and powers and newes also, that shortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdissar being otherwise occupied in warres, fighting against Ptolomye, made Eumenes his Lieutenaunt generall, and gaue him commission and full authoritie ouer all his fouldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, HHH iii commaunding them by the same that they should be obedient vnto Eumenes, and sufferhim A to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcet as, he flatly aunswered, that he would not be arthis warre: for the MACEDONIANS under his charge were ashamed totale armes against Antipater, and moreover they would not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bene to receiue him for their Captaine, fo much good will they bare him. Neoptolem on thother fide, was as ready to play the traitor, and to doe Eumenes a shrewde turne, as A cetas was. For being fent for by Eumenes to come to him, where he should have obeyed him. he fet his men in battell ray to fight with him . There did Eumenes reape the first frute of his wife forefight of the horfemen, which he had fet up to make head against the footemen of the MACEDONIANS, For when his owne footemen were broken and ouerthrowen, he ouercame Neoptolemm, and put him to flight with his horsemen, and tookeall his cariage. Then he made them march in order of battell against the MACED ONIANS, who were dispersed enery where following the chase of his footemen, whom they had ouerthrowen. Thus coming apon them in this diforder, he draue them to throwe away their weapons, and to yeelde vnto him; and moreouer, euerie man to take his othe to serue him faithfully in this warre, wheresoeuerhe would lead them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them you Craterus and Antipater: who fent ynto Eumenes to pray him to take their parte, with condition that he should not onely enjoy the contries and provinces still which he had in government. but furthermore that they would geue him others vnto them, and make him stronger thene. uer he was: besides that by thacceptation of thosfer, he should be taken for Antipaters good frend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made auniwere that having alwayes bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a fodaine become his frend foe cially feeing him vse his frendes as enemies: howebeit otherwise that he was very willing m make Craterus peace with Perdiceus, and to restore him againe to his fauor, apon reasonable & indifferent condicions. And furthermore, that if he ment to affaile him, that then he would aide him fo longe as he had any breath in his bodie, and would lofe his life before he would breake his promise. This aunswere being brought vnto Antipater, they sel to consult at leasure what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled apon his overthrowe, was come vnto them : who told them how the battell was fought, and befought them both vene instantly, (but Craterus chiefly) to gene him aide if it were possible. For the MACED ONIANS were fo farre in loue with him, that if they did but fee his hatte, and heare him speake, they have would all arme them selves and sollow him. For, to speake a troth, Craterus was had in great estimation amog the MACED ONIANS: insomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more de-

him to leave the king of PERSIAES maner, whereunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue him felfe: and also for that he maintained and defended the customes of the contry of MACEDON, the which every man through pride and excesse beganne to forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus fent Antipater into CILICIA, and he him felfe with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best parte of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vaprouided, supposing he would geue him selfe to pleasure and pastime, after so lace a victorie. E But Eumenes like a wife and vigilant Captaine had taken fuch order, that he heard newes time enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readines to relift Emments skill him. Yet was not this the chiefest point of his skill in warre. For he looked so precisely to his doings, that he did not only kepe his enemies fro knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men also to kill Craterius in battell, before they knew against whom they should fight, and to keepe also so dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge: that of all others shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policie. First, he made a rumor to be spred in his host, how Neoptolemus & Pigres were againe comen against him, with certaine horsemen of all sortes gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to have removed in the night, a great defire of F fleepe came apon him, in the which he had a maruelous straunge dreame. For it seemed vnto him that he faw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with an other, either of them leading a a harrell of footemen, ranged after the MACROONIAN facion who comming to gette charge thone apon the other, came the goddeffe Minerus to aide the one, and Ceres likewife to avde the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Mir nerses aided was ouerthrowen, and that Ceres had gathered cares of corne and made a crowne ofthem, to gene him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumener perhaaded him felfe that this dreame made for him, and promifed him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile contrie of come, where was great plenty of it. For all the fields were fowen with corne in every place. shatitiwas a pleasure to behold it, thewing the benefit of long peace, to fee all the corne fields how greene they looked. But whe he vaderstoode that the enemies had ginen their fouldiers for the fignall of battell, Minerus and Mexander then was his full imagination confirmed more then before. Whereuppon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for fignall of the battell to his fouldiers, and commained every man to make them a garlande of wheate eares to weare on their heades, and that they thould wreath flowers and notegayes about their pikes. He was in aninde many times to make his truftiest Captaines printe against whome they should fight. and not alone to trust him felie withall, to keepe so necessary a thing as that secret: yet in fine. hekept his first resolution, thinking it the safest way, not to commit this daunger, but to him felle. Now when he came to gene battell, he would place neuer a Macanon an directly a-sainft Crateries, but let two companies of men of armes that were ftraingers against him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus fonne) and Phanix Tenidian did lead. Then he focially commaunded, that fo foone as they faw the enemies before the, they should straight gene charge, either fide, and their staues being broken, they fell straight to their swordes: but that day did not Graterus dithonor the memory of Alexander, for he flue many of his enemies round about him, valliantly repulsed them that did affaile him, and many times overthrewe them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him fuch a blow on the fide, that he turned him of his horse, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Goreyas, one of Eume-mer Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to garde ing a fire with an old malice, they fought vp and downe thone for the other. So at the two first courfes they could not one light apon thother, but at the third meeting, when they knew one an other, then they let spurres to their horses, their swordes drawen, and with great cries gaue charge apon eche other. And their horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed gallies had met with their prowes : and both the Captaines laying the bridells in their horse neckes, clofediogether, and with both handes friued to plucke of eche others headpeace, and to rene

Gening them no leafure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Heraulde or tromper that they should fend ware them : for he feared much that the MACAD ONIANS Would turne against him, if they once came to know Crateria. Now for him selfe, he led the right wing of Banell behis battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefest men of all his armie, ner and Crawhere he should meete full with Neoptolemus fronte. ranfrom them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other falt as it they had wrestled together. Neoptolemus got vp first : but as he rose, Eumenes cutthe hamme of his legge, & raifed him felfe vp withall. Neoptolemus staying him felfe apon one knee, his other legge being very fore hurt, defended him felfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could geue him no deadly wound : neuerthelesse him selfe had a blow on the necke, that layed him flat on the grounde. Then Eumenes inflamed with choller against him. went about to strippe him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious moode, remem-

bred not that Neopeolemus had his fword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about it groyne, not farre from his privile partes: howebeit the wounde made Eumenes worfe already then there was cause of hurt, for that Neoptolemus strength was gone before the stroke tank dying presently apon it. Eumenes having stripped him found him self very il, (by reason of him woundes) on his armes and legges, which had many a fore gashe: notwithstanding, begoth on his horse againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies his bene fighting still. But there being told that Grateria had his deathes wound, he went straighting to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not past knowledge. Then Eumenes list had from his horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hande, accursed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitiefull state, and had also forced him to be in battell against one of the deerest frendes, to make him the instrument of his veter vindoing. This second battell Employer wanne tenne dayes after the first battell obtained, which got him great honor, for that he had discomfitted one of his enemies through wisedome, and the other by valliantnes. Buryetting bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his frendes also that tooke his pane when they bethought them, that he being a straunger, had with the weapons and powered the MACEDONIANS them selues, slaine the greatest and most famous Captaine among them Now if Perdice as had bene so happie, as to have lived and received thad vertilement of Cree. THE death: no dout he had bene the greatest person of all the MACED ONIANS. But as ill luck would have it, within two dayes after that Perdiceas was flaine in a mutinie of his mening. o'yrr,newes came to his army of Eumenes victorie, and also of the death of Craterus. Where upon the Macedonians were so offended with Eumenes; that incontinently they condend ned him to dve, & gaue Antigonus and Antipater commission to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes passing by mount Ida(where the king kept a race and brede of horses) had taken away with him as many horses as he would, and had sent letters of aduertisement thereof to the kinges ryders: Animater, as it is reported, smyled, and in mockerie sayd, that he marueled in fee Eumenes great care, to thinke that he should either gene or receive any account of the kinges goodes. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of Lydia, especially neere vnto the chiefe citie of SARDIS, bicause he was the stronger in horsemen, and fortha he would make Cleopatra fee the power of his armie. Howebeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into hie PHRYGIA, and wintered in the citie of Cr-LENES. But there Polemon, Alcetas, and Docimus, fell in convention with him for leading of the army, faying, that they had as much right to leade the army as he. Eumenes aunswered them, truely here is euen the comon faying vp and downe: desperate men regard no daunger. Now Eumenes having promifed his fouldiers pay within three dayes, to keepe his promeffe, folder them all the farmes & castells of that contrie, together with the men and beastes of the same, whereof the prouince was fully replenished. Thereupon his Lieutenauntes of the bandestauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of battery which he suffred them to carie with him: and having taken them, they went and denided the spoyle, paying enery souldier ratably his wages due. This denise brought him against in fauoramong his fouldiers. For certaine papers being founde in his campe cast abroadely his enemies, promifing great offices, and a hundred talents befides to any man that killed E. menes: the Maced Onlans that ferried under him were fo offended with all, that they prefent ly fet downe an order, that from that time forward a thowfande of the best fouldiers among them(which also had charge vnder them)(hould alwayes garde his person, keeping watchee uery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after an other. Whereunto they all agreed: & Emmenes gaue them those honors and rewardes, which the kinges of MACEDON were wonton generation their frendes, and which they gladly received. For through their graunt he had asthoritieto gene purple clokes and hattes to whom he thought good, which was the honors blest gift the kinge of MACEDON could geue. It is true that prosperitie maketh simplement high minded, whereby they feeme (though they be not) very honorable, but specially when fortune hath raifed them to honor & wealth. But in deede he that is of a noble minde & flow F The confiancy corage is best discerned in advertitie: for he never yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Emmenes. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies, (the Captaines by them felues, and the fouldiers anarte) he burnt them with the dores, gares, and windowes of all the villages & townes thereabouts that he could get together; and in steede of tombes for them, heraifed vp great heapes ofearth. Infomuch as Antigonus comming thither immediatly after he wondred much at his valliantnes & inuincible corage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonius cariage & thight Eumenes Brarafile without daunger haue taken a number of priloners, as well free as bond Sonalic porter tageame. all the riches & treasure which they had spoyled in so many fundrie warres townes and contries: howbeit he was afrayed that if his fouldiers were loden with that fpoyle, it would make them more heavy to march, and vnable to flie, but specially more tender to abide to gun from place to place a long time together, being the only meane wherein he trufted to come to and this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary of following thin folione a time. & therefore that he would turne fome other way. Moreover he perceived that it was ynpossible for him by his authority to keepe the MAGED ONTAN 5 from taking for ferie apray, as offred it felfe vnto them: whereupon he commaunded them to flay a while, & baire their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies carriage. But in the meane time he fecretly fent a meffenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the carriage) to will him to flie with all speede out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not farre from thence, and fafe from horsemen, where they could not be enuironned. and there to fortifie him felfe: fending him word also, that he fent him this advertisement, for meold frendship & acquaintance that had bene between them afore. Menander hearing what daunger he was in, made his men truffe vp their cariage straight. Thereupon Eumenes openly fent certaine light armed men to discouer, & to bring him newes: and therwithall commann. ded them to arme, and bridle their horfes, as if he had ment to have led them against the enemies. His skowtes were nowe returned, and told him that it was vnpossible either to distresse ontake Menander, for that he was fled into a place of fuch strength, & therefore he was not to D become by. Eumenes feemed to be very fory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence not withstanding Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, & the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, & after that loved him better then ever they did before bicause that having their childre in his hands whom he might have made flattes, & their wives also whom he might have defiled, he spared them al. How beit Antigonus to put them out of this humor told them, ye are deceived, my frendes: for it was not for your fakes, nor yet to pleafure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wives, your children, & your goods; but only for the feare he had to have shackles on his heeles, to let him from freedy flying; So Eumenes departing from thence fled ftill before Antigonia, & wandring vp & thowne, did him felfe wish his fouldiers to get them somewhere else, either in deede for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was viewilling to have fuch a number about him, being too fewe to fight's battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strong place of scituacion called Nora, in the confines of LYCAONIA & CAPPADOCIA, with fine hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed. And when he was comen thither also, he gaue enery one leaner to depart that asked him licence, bicause they could not have abidden the discomodity of the place, which was very straight, & the lacke of necessary viscolls which they must needes hand wanted, if the flege didcontinue long: & thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenaunce. Shortly after came Antigonus before the forte, but would not befrege it before he fent for Eumenes to come to him apon his word Eumenes aunswered him, that Autigonus had many of his frendes about him, that after him might come to be the heades of his I tribe, & that him felfe on thother fide had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therfore

if Antigonus would have him come and speake with him; that he should sende him one of his chiefest frendes in hostage. Againe Antigonus being carnest with him, and telling him it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: aunswered him, I will acknowledge none better then my selfe, so long as I can hold my from in my hand. In the end, Antigonia (according to Eumenes request) lent his owneneuew my into the force, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and Emmerialle luted eche other, as frendes of old acquaintance and familiaritie: and fo fell in talke of diner with Anigs matters; but all this while Euroceues neuer once made request to departe in safety, neither ye demaunded pardon, but only defired the confirmation of his charge & gouernment, and the he might be restored to that which was geuen him. They that were present at their meeting marueled much at Eumenes, & greatly commended his stowtnes. Now whilest they were the in talke together, the Macad Onians came out of all partes of the campe, to fee what mane of man Eumenes was : bicause that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN fouldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Neuertheleffe, Antigonus fearnes they would do Eumenes some mischiese, commaunded them alowde to geue backe, and made ftones to be throwen amonge them to keepe them of him. All this notwithstandinge here fayne in the end to put them of with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much a doe to deliuer him fafely into his force againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compafed this forte of Nora round about with a wall, and left a fufficient number of men to continent with a certaine life and familiarity of pleasaunt deuises to entertaine them at their meate For besides that he sought to shewe them as pleasaunt a countenaunce as he coulde, yet name rally he had a sweete fayer face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had bene trained up in it: but like a freshyouth, being of such a constitution of bodie, that the excellentest workeman that ever was could not better set out all the partes and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be seene in him. His speeche was not harsh nor churlishe, but very mylde, and pleafaunt, as appeareth by the letters hewrote. Now for the fiege, there was nothing that more annoyed the belieged, then the narrownes of the forte wherein they were

that they could scant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of esercise for them selves, or their horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishnesse that grow eth by idlenesse, (a thing most hurtefull to them that are acquainted with travell and paines) had exercise, to keepe them in breth, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occasion were offered; put his men into the longest & widest hall he had in his house, (being fourteene cubits long to walks vp and downe in) and raught them first of all to march fayer and softly, and then by little & little to haften their pace. For the horses he had, them he made to be girt before, one after an other & then did foftly trife them vp with long pulleyes fastned to the beames: their hindmost feet standing on the ground, & their formost being alost. The horses being trised up in this mane, their riders came with lowde cries behinde them, & fome with whippes in their hands to lash them, that the horse being mad with all, yerked out behind, & sprang forward with his formed legges to touch the ground, that they did but even rafe it a litle, so as every vaine and finew of them were strained by this meanes, that they blue, and were all of a some withall, so good an exercise to the it was, as well to put them in breth, as to kepe their legges supple to run. After that, they had their otes very cleane pickt & dreffed, that they might difgeft them the fooner, Antigonus having long continued this fiege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in Macedon, &that the realme was in a great broyle, through the factions of Cassander & Polyperchan, Antigonus, whose head was straight full of great imaginations, greedily coueting with him selfe the whole kingdom of MACEDON: thought good to make Eumenes his frende, that

A Refayd: that he did referre him felfe to the judgement of the Macan ONIANS which kept him befreged, to judge which of those two formes were most meetest: that which Antigonis had fent him, or the same which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of othe, there was a lide mencion only made at the beginning of the blood royall, but in all the rest following, he bound Eumenes particularly to him felfe. But Eumenes in his forme of othe, did first of all put Olympias the mother of kinge Alexander, and the kinges his sonnes afterwardes: and for the relt, he sware he would be frende of the frendes, and enemie of the enemies, not of Anticomu onely, but of the kinges, and of Olympias. The Maced ONIANS being at the flege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes othe, than they did that of Antigonus. So having genen Eumenes his othe, & made him fweare according to that forme: they raifed their flege. and fent also vinto Antigonus to take his othe. All this accomplished, Eumenes redelinered the

CAPPADOCIANS their hostages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their steade, horse of warre, beastes of carriage, tentes and panillions. Thus he beganne to gather his men againe together, which were dispersed abroade after his overthrowe, so that in fewe dayes he was about a thowsande horsemen, with whom he fled. fearing yet Antigonus, and he did wifely, For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them m shutte him vp againe straighter then he was before : but besides that wrote sharpe letters and verie angrily vnto the MACHDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the othe. Whilest Eumenes wandered vp & downe flying still, he received letters from certaine in M A-CEPONIA (fearing Antigonia greatnesse) and specially from Olympias: which sent vnto him C to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young sonne Alexander. whome they fought to put to death. These two Captaines having ereceived these letters, did vie Eumenes Eumenes, with very good wordes, & shewed him great countenaunce: yet a man by their lookes might philippes Deafily conjecture that they enuied him, for either of them both thought them felues men fuf- Lieutenaum ficient, and worthie to commaunde Eumenes, not to aide him. Howebeit Eumenes behaued of his amy. him selfe very wifely. For as touching their enuie, he pacified that, bicause he tooke not the Alexanders money which he was commanded to take for his owne vie, for that he had no neede of it. And fondiers, fo as for their ambition and prefumption, difdaining to be commaunded by him, though they their filtered

He made them beleue that Alexander did appeare to Eumenessen him in his fleepe, and that he frewed him a pauillion sumptionally fette out in the state and Emmene fair magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne; and tolde him, that if they would med denife. kepetheir councell place in that pauillion, he would be present among them, and ayde them E in all their councells and conduct of their warres, so that they would alwayes beginne by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleue that which he spake, who would not goe to him to confult of any matters : neither did he thinke it honorable for him felfeto be seene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their consents they incontinently set vo the hie contries and met with Peucestas on the way, (Eumenes very great frende) who loyned with them, and other great pieres of the realme, with all their power befides. This did greatly strengthen the armie of the noble men of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne persones, bicause they had no man F to commaunde them since the death of Alexander, they were growen selfe willed by dissolute libertie, and effeminate in their maner of life: and moreover they had gotten a tyrannicalliferceneffe, nourished & increased by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with an other, but shamefully flattered A the old bandes of the MACIDONIAN fouldiers, geuing them money, and making them ban kets and feastles of sacrifices. And thus in shorte time, of a campe they brought it to be add folute tauerne, where the noble men got the fouldiers fauor that they might be chosen chief. taines of all the armie: like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honorable states and offices of the common wealth Now Eumenes found straight that these pieres of the realme disdained one an other, howeher that they all feared and mistrusted him, and sought but for oportunity to kill him. Wherefore

to preuent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupie money, and so borrowed great summe of the especially, whom he knew most hated him: to the end that from thence. forth they should no more distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the money they had a lent him. And thereof followed a straunge thing: for other mens money and goodes, was the safetie of his life. For where others geue money to saue their lines, he by taking of money sa ued his owne life. Now for the fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whileft they fawe they were without daunger of enemies to make them afraied, they still hong apon them that gaue them. being desirous to be made Generalles: and came euery morning to their vprising to waitea. pon them, and follow them wherefocuer they went. hard by them with a great and puisant army, and that their case required then a valliant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the fouldiers alone, but all the pieres and states besides, (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) fubmit them selues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundement. For when Antigonus affaired all the wayes he could to c passe ouer the river of Passigris, the pieres which were layed in divers places to let him from Pasitigris fl. passing ouer, heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eumenes onely that relisted him. and fought with him: where he flewe fuch a number of his men, that he filled the river with tell with An them, and tooke foure thowfande of them prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was sicke, these olde bandes did more plainly shew, what opinion they had of him, and of others: to wit, that they could banket them, and make them good cheere at their houses, yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthieft to be their Captaine, and to commaunde them. For Peucellas hauing feasted them in the kingdom of PERSIA, and geuen euery souldier a mutton to facrifice, thought he had wonne great fauor & credit among them. But shortly after, as the army marched against their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell daungerously sicke, & therfore would n needes be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noyfe, bicause he could take no rest. But they had not gone farre, before they saw their enemies, which having passed our certaine litle hills betwene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the fouldiers fawe the gliftering of the gilt armors of their enemies, that glared in the funne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephantes with the towers apon their backes, and the men at armes with their purple coates apon their armors : (which was the apparel they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the formest stayed apon it, and cried out, willing them to fend for Eumenes to lead them, for they would els goe no furtherif they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raifed their pykes, & layed downe their shieldes at their feete, calling from one to an other to stay, & to their prinate Captaines I also: and told them plainly, that they would not sturre a foote from thence, nor fight at all, vnlesse Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speede, hastening his slaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on every side, he held out his right hand to the souldiers, and tolde them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The fouldiers also so some as they sawe him, saluted him in the MACED ONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their shieldes, clapping them against their pykes with a great showte, bidding their enemies come when they would, they shoulde be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on thother fide, being informed by certaine prisoners which his souldiers had taken in skermish, that Eumenes was fallen very fore ficke, and by reason thereof was caried in a litter: thought nowe he should haueno F great a doe to discomfit the rest of the army, and therefore made all possible speede he could to fight. But when he came so neere, that he might easily see the order and countenaunce of

A his enemies, who were fet in such good order of battell, that it could not any waves be amended: he was much amased with all, and pawsed a great while, and in the meane time spied Eumenes litter a farre of, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out alowed, as his maner was, and turning him selfe to his frendes, sayd. See, sayd he, I beleue it Antigonal is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with those wordes, he mocke to En

a litle passed ouer, the MACED ON IANS fell to their olde trade againe, the pieres to flatter the fouldiers, and the fouldiers to waxe braue and stowte against their Captaines: so that when they came to take their garrifons for the winter time, they deuided in maner among them the whole contrie of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a thowsand furn longe of. Which Antigonus vnderstanding, determined to set apon them, they mistrusting nothing. And so went sodainly towards them, by a shorter way then that he had already commen, but the worler way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if he met them thus dispersed asunder, their Captaines could not readily assemble them all together, But while he was in this his iorney, in the defert crooked way, he was fo ouertaken and with fuch boysterous windes and extreame bitter cold that his fouldiers could go no further. but were forced to tary stil, to prouide them present remedy against the sury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knewe of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines towardes the defert. heing amased to see such a number of fires in the valley, fent presently with speede apon two camells light loden, to aduertife Peucestas, who being neerest vnto the mountaine was so scared with these newes, that he was at his wittes end, not knowing what to doe. For, seeing his other companions as much afrayed as him felfe, he fled apon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, affuring them that he would flav the fodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they should come three dayes later than they looked for: which they beleued . Then did Eumenes sende messengers into every quar- Eumenes strate ter to all the Captaines, commaunding them speedily to put their men in readinesse, and to gainst stige. meete him at a certaine place which he appointed. In fortified the fame with trenches, and detided it out into quarters, making fire in every place, such a distance of one from an other, as they vie commonly to make in a campe. It was no fooner done, but Antigonus came to the toppe of the mountaines, and fawe these fires a farre of, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had longe before knowen of his comming, and that they came against him. Being afrayed therfore least his enemies would compell him to fight, comming freshe apon him, his owne men being weary and done with the paines they had abidden, comminge through that defert contrie: he tooke his way to lead backe his armie, not the neerest way by the which he came, but through the contry richlyinhabited and replenished with great cities and good townes, to refteshe his ouerwearied people. Yet feeing he had none alaroms geuen, nor any skermishes offered him, (as they vie F commonly when both armies are neere together) and that the valley men told him that they had seene none other armie but his, sauing that round about there was store of fires: then he straight mistrusted that it was one of Eumenes stratageames of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to steale apon him, but to put all to the hasard of a battell. But in the meane time, the most parte of the hoast was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimacion euery man had of his wisdom and sufficiency insomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he only as their Lieutenaunt generall should commaund the wholearmy. This spited the two Captaines of the Argyraspides, Antigenes & Teutamus, who bare him such Emer the caan inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practifed his death: & affembling together panion of ver-after they should put him to death. This being thus resoluted apon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and an other called Phedimus, went fecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded apon in the affembly against him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for the they fought to pleasure him, but only bicause they were asrayed to loose the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thankes, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his best frendes, and tolde them: you see howe I am enuironned with a troupe of wilde Exements tare and brutishe beastes. That done, he made his will, and tare all the letters and wrytinges that all his frender had bene sent him, bicause he would not have them suffer for him after his death, that had fent him fecret aduertisementes. Afterwardes when he had disposed of all his private matters in this forte, he stoode in a doute whether he shoulde lose the battell geuing his enemies the victorie, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA and R ARMENIA. Howebeit he resolued of nothing before his frendes. But when the mischiefehe was in had put divers thoughtes into his head, in fine he determined to fight, and did fethis army in battell ray, perswading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous people to standton like men. And as for the olde fouldiers of the MACED ONIANS, they fo litle needed exhoration, that they them selues did exhorte Eumenes to be of good corage, saying: that their ene. mies would neuer abide them, bicause they were all the oldest souldiers, and of greatest experience, that had bene in all the conquestes of kinge Philippe, and of his sonne Alexander, and The old band that it was neuerheard that they had bene ouerthrowen in any fette battell, the most of them being three score and tenne yeares olde, and the youngest no lesse then three score. Whereeurry man 60 upon, when they ranne with great furie to geue charge apon their enemies, they criedoutayear old and lowde speaking to the souldiers of the MACED ONIANS that were under Antigonus: Ahwret-Emmener con. ches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And so assailing them with a lustic corage, and in a

Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowen on that fide: but on tho. ther side where his men of armes were, through Pencestas cowardlinesse (that handeled him felfevery ill at that battell) he had the vpper hande, and wanne all their cariage, through his forefight in the greatest furie of the battell, and the strength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruelous great plaine of length, neither too depe, nor yet to hard ynderfoote, but couered ouer with a small fine fand, much like to the drie fand the sea casteth vp.& leaueth apon the shore. This sand being scattered abroade by riding and going to & fro of 6 n many thowsandes of men and horses during the time of the battell foughten, had raised such a mightie dust and white smoke in the element, as if they had sturred or tempered white lime together, which troubled their fight fo fore, as they could fee nothing before them: in respect whereof Antigonus might easily sease all their carriage, them selves being neuer a whit the wifer. The battell being come to this passe you have heard, Teutamus sent presently vnto Antirenus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage againe, which he had taken & caried into his campe. Antigonus made him aunswere, that he would not only redeliuer the goodes vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreouer vse them with all the fauor he could, so farre foorth as they delivered Europenes into his handes. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke presently a wicked resolution, to deliuer him aliue into the handes of his enemies. And with that deter- E Argyrafpides. mination they came neere vnto him, not makinge any countenaunce as though they would lay handes on him, but rather feeming to garde and defend his persone as their manner was: fome of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had wonne the battell: and others acculing the noble men of cowardlines, saying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of the hauing spied his time, flew to him, and tooke his fword out of his hande: the others straight laved hold of him, and bound both his handes behinde him with his owne girdle. THE COMPARISON, OF

Ere have we fet downe the thinges worthie memorie of Emmene; and Sertorius. Nowe to compare them together, in this they were both alike : that they being ftraungers in a straunge contrie, and banished out of their owne, had alwayes bene Capraines of dillers nations, and chiefetairies of great and warlicke armies. But this was proper to Se chiefetaines or great and warneste armes. Dut tims was proper to so-torius, that all those of his faction gaue him the chiefest place of an h thoritie, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthieft w commaund where Eumener having many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the fame. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be governed by a good Captaine . & for their owne safety gave place to the other, feeing them lelues viable to command. For Sertorius being a ROMANE, gouerned the Spa-NYANDS and L. V. SITANIANS : and Eumenes a CHERRONESIAN, the Macedonians. Of the which, the SPANTARD'S of long time had bene fubicat to the Empire of Rome, and the Mit CEDONIANS at that time had fubdued all the worlde. Furthermore, Sertorias beingethened great estimation for that he was a Senatour of Rome, and had had charge of men of ware ! before, came to the dignity & estate to be chieferaine of a great army. Where Eumenes came with small reputacion, disdained for that he was but a secretarie: and when he began to come forwardes, had not only leffe meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets & impedimentes also, to hinder his rising and estimation. For many openly stoode against him, and fecretly compired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the begin ning, vntill his latter ende, when certaine of his companions fecretly confirmed against him. Therefore Sertorius ende of all his daungers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Elimination greatest danngers came through his victories, which he wanne of his owne men, through the

The deduce malice of them that enuied his honor. Nowe for their deedes of armes, they are both in macond some of net alike : but on thother fide for their conditions; Emmenes naturally loued warre and con F Sourcine co- tention: and Sertorius imbraced peace & quietnes. For Eumenes that might have lived in fallry with honor, if he would but have geven place to his betters, and for laken the warres : liked better with the daunger of his life to followe marriall feates; with the greatest personages of MACEDON, and in the end to came to his death, Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the fafetie of his person to take armes against them that would not behim live in peace. For had not Eumenes bene fo ambitious and flower to firiue against Antionnus for the chiefest place of authoritie, but could have bene contented with the seconde. Antigonus would have bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would never fo much as fuffer Sentorius to live in rest. So, the one made voluntary warn's onely to rule, and the other against his wil was compelled to rule, bicause they made warres with him. Wherby it appeareth that Emenes naturally loued warre, preferringe the couctous defire of a better estate, aboue the blewof his life : and the other as a right fouldier, yied the warres only for a meane to faue his Biologyaliar defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was flaine, miltrufting no treason against hims and the other looking every hower for prefent death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a troble minde; porto miltrust them whom he thought his frendes : and the other she wed a faint hart, being taken when he ment to flie. So Sertorine death dishonored not his life, Sertorine fuffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could never make him fuffer. boneft, then The other having no power to anoide his destinic before he was taken, and having sought the death of meanes to live being in prison and captivitie: could neither paciently nor manfully abide his Eumenes. death. For, begging life at his enemies handes, he gaue him his hart with his body, who before had but his body in his power.

But Times cared not much for it, as Daris wryteth: for otherwhile as the fate amongel h her women, foftly the called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On thother fide they reporte, that Alcibiades him selfe sayd, it was for no hurt he ment to any man, that he lay with Queene Timea, but only for the defire he had that fome of the kinges of LACEDEMON should be begotten of his feede. Neuertheles at the length he was drinen to forfake LACED EMON, militure fting king Agu, who euer after douted of the childe, & thought him a baftard : vntill fuch time

Agis before many witnesses, said he did acknowledge him for his sonne. This notwithstanding, when king Agu was dead, Lasander that had then ouercomen the Athentans by sea, & was created king, more in credit & authority in the city of Spanta, than any other practifed to put the crowne apon Agestiam head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest vnto it, bicause he was a bastard. The like did divers other citizens fay of him, which loved Agesilaus vertue, and liked him paffingly, for that he had bene brought up from his childhood among them. But on the contrary parte also, there was a Soothsayer or wisard in Sparta, called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, & was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies A lame king, and divinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Span

TA: and for proofe thereof he told this auncient oracle before the counsell, As stately as thy stomake is o Sparta take good heede, And stand upon thy gard, and looke about thee I thee reede. For halting one day downe will cast thine Empire to the ground, By meane of wvarres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round, Lyfander replied against it, saying, that if the Spart ans were astrayed of this oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For the goddes cared not, if any man lame of a foote aA foired to be king: but rather if he were a baftard, and not lineally descended of the race of Herseles, For that, fayd he, were to make the kingdom halte. Agefilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune him felfe had witneffed, that Leotychides was a bastatd: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wives chamber, and that tenne monethes after that, and more, Leorychides was borne. So was Agestlaus apon these allegacions not onely proclaimed Agestlaus proking of Sparta; but he had geuen him moreouer, as lawful heire, all his brother Agis goods, claimed king. and Leotychides rejected as a bastard. Notwithstanding, considering that his parentes by his des a bastard. mothers fide were very poore, (yet honest men) he left them the moyty of all the goodes: by which act, Agefilaus wanne all their good willes, where elfe they had enuied him for his fucceffion in the kingdom. And (as Xenophon fayth) by obeying his contrie, he grew to fuch powerthat he might doe what soener he would. The Ephori and Senatours at that time bare all the sway and gouernment of the common wealth, the Ephores office chaunging yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were only ordained to bridle the infolency of the kings, Ephori tare for that they should not (as we have more amply wrytten in Lycurgus life) have absolute po- certaine offwer in their handes. Vppon this occasion, the kinges that succeeded in the gouernment, had fed to conorte (as it were) by inheritaunce, a present grudge and malice against them. This notwithstanding, the kinges in-Applicant tooke a contrary course to all his predecessors. For where others presently quarelled inimitive if a. with the Ephori and Senatours, Agefilaus did honor and reverence them, and would never my were by difparche any matter without their privity, but was alwayes ready to goe when they did fend them ofed. him. When he was fet in his chaier of state to geue audience, if any of the Ephori chaunsed to come in, he would rife vp vnto them : and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honors fake present him a gowne, and an oxe. And thus cunningly seeming to honor and increase the dignity of the Senatours, winning their good wills, he made his power great. & the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauior towards the rest of his contrymen was such, Agestlau, an as his enmity was leffe faulty the his frendthip. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iuft cause, but he aided his frends euen in vniust causes. And wheras he thought it a shame not to frend. honor enemies, when they had done well: he could not finde in his hart to rebuke his frendes when they did amisse, but rather gloried in succoring & helping of them in their euill doings. For he thought it no thame to ferue his frendes turne, howfoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduerfaries offended, he was as fory for it as any man, and as readie to beare with it if he D were intreated: whereby he allured and wanne the hartes of all men. The Ephori feeing that. and fearing his power, punished him in mony for that he made the common loue of his constrifewere taken out of nature, it would come to passe that the heavenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all thinges should be at a stay, by reason of the mutuall agreement betwene the worlde and them : euen fo, the lawemaker of LACED EMON feemeth to have allowed ambition & strife in the common wealth, as a spurre to vertue, by procuring VVhehr caalwayes some contencion and emulacion amonge great persones. And his reason was that the mobility be this base and effeminate sauor, in winking one at another, when men are to be rebuked, ought profitable in a not of right to be called by the name of concorde. And fure some thinke that Homer also faw common E thesame, for he would neuer else haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to fee Vlysses and wealth. Achilles at great wordes together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contencion among great men, were very available for the common wealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and doe bring great quer the LACED EMONIANS signory by sea. Lyfander being glad of this occasion, longing to besent againe into Asia to succour his frends whom he had left there as Gouernors & Lieutenants of cities & prouinces (of the which, some of them were driven away by their citizens, others also put to death for abusing of their authority & ruling ouercruelly:) perswaded Age-F silaus to goe into Asia, to make warre apon this barbarous king, farre from GRECE, before his army were gathered together. And to copasse this the easilier, he wrote vnto his frends in Astathat they should send vnto SPARTA, to require Agesilaus for their Captaine, and so they

newes were brought him out of Asia, that the king of PBRSIA prepared a great nauv to contriepriuate to him selfe. For, as naturall Philosophers holde opinion, that if contention and did. Thereupon Agefilam going to the affembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would geue him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counfellers & all. stants to him in these warres, two thowsand free I LOTES, & six thowsand of the consederates of LACED # MON. All this was immediatly graunted through Lysanders frendthippe towards

Azefiam in him, and he was sent away straight with the thirty Captaines which he had requested: of the which Lyfander was the chiefest, not only for his riches and authoritie, but also for the good will he bare vnto Agesilaus: who thought him selfe more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, than for his frendship he shewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Agefilan army being affembled at the hauen of Geræste, him selfe with certaine of his frends went yn to the citie of AVLIDE, where in his sleepe he drempt that one sayd vnto him: O king of the LACEDEMONIANS, thou knowest that neuer none but Agamemnon, & now thy selfe, was cho. fen Generall of all GREECE, considering therefore that thou commaundest the same people he did, that thou makest warres with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to goe thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same facrifice vnto the goddesse, the which he made at his like departure. Agesilaus straight apon this vision, remembred that A. gamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothsayers did sacrifice his owne daughter in the same place. Yet this made him not afrayed, but the next day he told it to his frendes, and said he would sacrifice that vnto the goddesse, which he thought woulde please her well enough and that he would not followe that cruell denotion of this auncient Captaine Agameman And with that, he brought a hynde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commaunded his Soothfayer to facrifice her: and would not suffer him to have the honor to doe the sacrifice, c that was appointed for the same purpose by the Gouernors of Bosotia, according to the custome of that place. The Gouernors of BOEOTIA vnderstanding it, were much offended and sent their officers to will Agestlaus not to doe any facrifice there, contrarie to the law and custome of their contrie. The officers that were sent, performed their commission: and sinding that the beast was slaine, & the quarters of it apon the aulter, they tooke and slong them of the aulter enery way. This vexed Agefilaus being readie to imbarke, and departed thencein choller against the THEBANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this valuckie prediction, which feemed to prognosticate vnto him, that he should not preuaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arrived at Ephesys, he presently misliked the honorhe faw done vnto Lyfander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the contriementheren repaired continually to his house, that when he came abroade, they all followed him wherfocuer he went: as though Lyfander had in deede bene in authority to doewhat he would and that Agefilaus only had but the name to be general, so appointed by the law of LACED EMON. For in troth there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine in those partes that had won him suchesti-mation, nor that was more feared than he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficial to his frends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these thinges being field in memorie, the contriemen of that contrie perceiuing the simplicity of Agesilau, and howe he was geuen to please the people, and caried no great maiestie nor countenaunce with him, and observing in Lysander that wonted roughnes and sharpespeech wherewith they had bene acquainted before: euery man obeied him, and nothing was done but what he commaunded. E This first of all made the other Spart ans angrie, for that it appeared they were comeasit were to serue Lysander, and not as to counsell the king: but after that, Agesilaus him selfe also grew miscontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor sorie to see others honored besides him selfe. Yet being a man ambitiously genen, and of a noble corage, searing if he should doe any noble exploye in this warre, that they would impute it vnto Lysander, for the great estimation he was of: he first beganne to deale in this forte with him. First he contraried all his counsells: and what matters soeuer he preferred, which he was desirous should haue taken effect, Agesilaus would none of that, but tooke some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lysanders followers came to make fute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lyfander: he fent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in F matters of judgements, if Lysander were against any, they were sure to have the matter passe on their side. On the contrarie parte also, if Lyfander bare good will to the partie, and fauored the cause to gratific himsthey hardly escaped from setting a fine of their heades. Agestians coniniting the feshewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chaunce to one or two, but indifferently roall: Ly/ander looking into the cause, diffembled not with his frendes, but rold them plainly that it was for his fake they had those repulses and wronges, and therefore did counsell them rowaite apon the king, and those that had more credit then him selfe. Now Agefilans suppor fed hegaue that aduite to make every man to malice him: wherfore to despite him the more, hemade him distributer of his vittells, (& hauing done so) some say that he spake these words see the life of in open presence of many: nowe let them goe and honor my flein distributer. Lylander being Lylander grieued withall, fayd vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppreffe your trendes. And bodoe I, fayd Agefilans, how to keepe them under that would be greater than my felfe. It may

B bever, replied Lysander, I have not done as your grace doth say: yet if you so conceine of me putme I beseeche you in some place of charge or office, where I may doeyou good teruice without offence. After this talke betwene the, Agefilaus fent him into Hellespont, where hypractife he tooke prisoner a noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of tharnabaprouince whereof he was Gouernor, and brought him to Agefilaus with a great furnise of golde and filuer, and neere about two hundred horfemen with him. All this notwithstanding. he forgate not his grudge to Agesilaus, but being offended stil, sought oportunitie and meanes mdefeate the two houses of the privilege of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and furely he had made great broyle (in my opinion) in the city of Sparta, had he not bene preueted by death, in a iorney he made into B OE.O T IA. Thus we fee, that ambitious mindes observing no meane, are in a common weale of trimes more hurt- Ambitions full than beneficiall. For though Lysander was in deede intollerable, to shew him selfe so amhirlous, and out of time: yet was not Ageflaus ignoraunt neither, that there were divers other rous in a commeanes leffe reprochful to punish such a noble man, that offended only by gredines of honor, mon wealth, But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfepassion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his frendes imperfection. Now Tilaphernes Agefiant arthefirst being afrayed of Agefilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnder- dede in Afra, and the failethand that the king would be content to fet the cities of GRECE in Asia at liberty. Notwith hood of Tilaflanding, when he thought he had gathered force fufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed phenes. warre. Agefilaus was very well content withall: for thexpectation was great of him through Dall Greet, that he would doe some noble exployt in this formey. Moreouer he thought him felues: and that he which was the Lieutenaunt generall of the LACED & MONIANS (who at that time commaunded both sea and lande) should not doe some deede worthie memorie among the GRECIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periurie by just deceir, he made a countenaunce as though he would first inuade the contrie of Caria. Whereuppon, this barbarous person Tisaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Agestians on a sodaine returned backe againe, and entred into Phrygia, tooke there many cities, and wanne great fpoyle, making his men fee by experience, that to infringe & breake a league made & aucwed by othe, was a facriledge, and contemning of the goddes. On thother fide also, that to Deguilo his enemies, it was not only just and honorable: but also profitable and pleasant. Now Arekhubeing weaker in horiemen than his enemy, and finding the liners of the beattes which he had facrificed, without heades, returned into the citie of EPHB SV s, and there gathered horseselle dishonored for euer, that the tenne thowsande GRECIANS which were returned backe from the furthest parte of Asia, even vnto the sea Major (vnder the conduct and leading of men together, letting the richinen understand (which would not them seluces letter in person) that he did dispense with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for fernice in their place. Many of them tooke that course, & by this meanes Agoffice within few dayes had leauted a great number of men of armes, in steade of footemen that could doe finall wast. feruice. For they that were viwilling to goe to the warres, did hier them that were willing to ferue in their place : and fuch also as would not ferue a horsebacke, did gene them pay that were desirous to serue in their steades. In this he wisely followed king deamengons example. who did diffense with the person of a riche coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agefilans had commaunded them that fold the prisoners by the dronners taken in the warres, that they should strippe them naked, & so sell them: which they did. And fundry persons willingly bought their spoyles and rayment, but they scorned their bodies, is cause they sawe them white skinned, fost, and delicate: so that sewe men would out bid the price for them, for that they thought those men unprofitable and good for nothing. Aggillar also being present at this sale of purpose, sayd thus vnto his men. See, my frendes, quodbe these be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoyles for the which yeshall fight. Time being come now to put him felfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies control againe, he gaue it out that he would enter L yo 14, not meaning to deceive Tifaphernes againe but Tisaphernes deceiued him selfe. For he being deceiued before by Agesilaus, gaue no credit to this fecond rumor, but perswaded him selfe that doutlesse Agesilaus ment then to enterin ! to CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woddie contrie, very ill for horsemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agesilaus invading (as he had genen it out) the cham. pion contry, in the which stoode S and is, the capitall city of Lydia: Tifaphernes was compel. led to come to reskue it in haft, and being come thither with great speede with his horsemen. he stale apon many of his enemies whom he found straggling out of order, spoyling the contrie, & put the most of them to the sword. Agesilaus having intelligence of this, imagined with him selfe that the sootemen of his enemy could not yet be arrived, & considering also that he time any lenger. Thereupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed sootemen, and commaunded them straight to charge the enemy, whilest he caused the heavier armed meno follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled apon it immediatly: and the GRECIANS luftely following the chase, tooke their campe, & made great slaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leafure enough not only to spoyle & ouerrunthe kinges contry at their pleasure, but also to see the reuenge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruell enemie to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made an other his Lientenaunt immediatly in his roome, called Tithraultes: who strake of Timphernes head, and sen vnto Agesilans to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of golde and film to departe out of his contrie. Thereto Agesilaus aunswered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACED EMONIANS: and that for his owne parte, it was an easier mater to enriche his fouldiers, than him felfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thoughtin had his army whole about him: thought it best forthwith to bid him battel, rather the to delay dishonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then spoyles. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tithraustes somewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the fumme of thirtie talentes genen him to defray his charges, he withdrue his army out of Lydia, and went into Phrygia. In his iorney he received from the council of LACED # MON, the Scytala, or scrolle of parchement wreathed about, aduertising himthan the citizens had made him also their Generall by sea, as he was by lande. Agestlans onely of all men obtained this honor, who without coparison was of all other the worthiest man of same rall of all the in his time, as Theopompus witneffeth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his ver-Lacedamotue, than for the greatnes of his authority. In this notwithstanding he was to be blamed, when niani nauy, he made choyse of one Pisander his wives brother, to be Lieurenaunt of the navy, & forsooke ! other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: feeking rather to please his wife, and to aduaunce one of his kinne, than to regarde the weale and fafety of his contrie. Afterwards he led his army into Pharnabazas contrie which he had in charge, where he founde not onely

plenty of all fortes of vittells, but gathered together also a wonderfull masse of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with kinge Congr. who for his vertue and constant fidelity, was very desirous of his frendship. The like did spithridates, forfaking Pharmabazsus, and came vnto Agefilaus: and after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwayes followed him wherefocuer he went. Spithridates hada young sonne that was passing faier, called Megabetes, (of whom Agessiaus had great liking) and likewife a fayer young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Agefilaus canfed P king Cotys to marry. So, taking of king Cotys a thowfand horsemen and two thowsand sootemen light armed, he returned backe into Parygra, and there destroyed Pharnabazus contre a which he had in government, who durft not meete him in the fielde, nor truft to his holdes. but still fled from him, carying all his chiefest thinges with him, flitting from place to place. untill that Spithridates, accompanied with Erippidas the SPARTAN, followed him fo neere. Agefilans that he tooke his campe, and all his treasure in it. But there did Erippidas shewe him selfe so make your ond hard and cruell, ouerstraightly searching out parte of the spoyle that had bene imbeaceled, of his semes. compelling the barbarous people to deliver it againe, ranfacking every corner for it; that Spi-

thridates was fo offended withall, that on a sodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him. and went backe vnto the citie of SARDIS. This more grieued Agefilaus, than any thing that happened to him in all his iorney: for that he had loft so valliant a man as Spithridates, and fuch a number of good fouldiers as he caried away with him. Moreouer, he was afraved least n they would detect him of miferable couetoufnes, a thing which he euer was carefull to anoid. not onely in his owne persone, but also to keepe all his contriemen from it. But besides these knowen causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates sonne pinched him neerely:though when the how was with him, he striued with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection and defirehe had of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him, & to kiffe him: Apellans turned his face from the boy. The boy being alhamed of the repulle, durit no more come to familiarly, but faluted him aloofe of. Agefilaus then repenting him that he had not fuffered Megabates to kiffe him, made as though he marueled why he did not kiffe him as he was wont to doe. Then aunswered some of his familliars about him: your selfe, Oking, is in faulte, bicause you durst not tarie, but were afrayed to kille so fayer a boy. For if he knewe your minde, he would come againe, fo that you turned your face no more away. When Agefleus had heard them, he pawfed a while, and faid neuer a word, but in fine aunswered them: It shall not neede you say any thing to him, for it would doe me more good I could refuse such an other kiffe againe, then if all that I fee before me were golde. Thus was Agefilaus disposed whe Megabates was with him: but in his absence he did so loue him, that I dare scantly say, that if the boy had come againe into his presence, he would have refused a kisse at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus fought to speake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a frende vnto them both. Agefilaus was the first that met at the place appointed with his frends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he layed him downe vpon then spoyled and sacked by them. Ageislans then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meting, hong downe their heades for thame, not knowing how to aunswere him, confidering that Pharnabazus had injury offered him: began to speake in this maner. Hereto-belt service I can against you. This aunswere passingly pleased deeplass, who taking him by the hand, and rifing up with him, fayd vnto him. I would with (my Lord Pharnabar withaning Flo noble a minde as thou haft, that thou were rather our frend, then an enemy. So Pharnaba zu departing from thence with his men, his sonne being left behinde ranne to Agestlaw, and fmiling told him. King Agesilans, I will make thee my frend: and therewith gave him a dart he the depe graffe in the shadow, under a fayer great tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, & they The meeting De fored foft skinnes long heared, and tapeftry excellently wrought of divers colours, for him to of Agefiani firon apon the grounde. But being ashamed to see Agesilaus laied on the bare grounde in that bazus, force, he also lay downe by him, though he had vppon him a maruelous riche gowne, of excellent tiffue & paffing colour. Now when they had embraced one an other, Pharmabazas began first to speake, and lacked no good perswassions & just complaints, for that he having bene (ashe was) a frende vnto the LACED EMONIANS in the warre against the AT BENTANS, was fore when we were frendes with the king (my Lord i harnaba 7 113) we have vsed his goodes like declians E frends but now that we are his enemies like enemies we vie them: and fence we fee that thou worder union wiltneedes be a flaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his fake. But when though that "Pharmabalikerather to be a frend of the GRECIANS, then a flaue to the king of PERS rather make account, that all these fouldiers, this armor, our shippes, and all we are to defend thy goodes and liberty against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly : furely, fayd he, if the king doe fende hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenaunt, befure I will then take your parte firaight. But on thother fiele, if he make me his Lieutenaunt in this warre; wruft to it, I will do him the

Sgefilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beawtie of the young youth, and the curtefie he had offred him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might bestow on him. At the last he spied his secretarie Adeus horse, which had a rich capariffon on: he straight tooke it from him, and gaue the horse & furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus sonne, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunsed afterwardes that being driven out of his contrie by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Agefilen made very much of him, and did not sticke to further him in his loue abroade. For he hada great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whome they brought vp in wrestling, one dayn play for the best games. But when he was growen a bigge man and strong, and that he came to offer him selfe to be billed with them that should wrastle at the games Olympicall, being in fome perill to be vtterly refused : this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Agesilaus, and befought his helpe, that this wrastler might not receive the foyle to be reiected. Agesilambe. ing desirous to pleasure him, performed his request with some difficultie. Thus Agesslausin his frendes, was without all thinges else was a straight observer of the law but in his frendes causes to be straight laced in matters of iustice, he sayd that was but an excuse for them that would do nothing for their frendes. To this effect, they finde a letter of his wrytten vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his frende. If Nicias have not offended, lette him goe : if he have offended, then Agefilasus lespardon him for my fake. But howesoeuer it be, let him goe. This was Agestlaus manner in the most parte of his frends causes. Notwithstanding, occasions fell out oftentimes, that he rather halfe of his inclined to the benefit of the common wealth. As appeared one day when he was driven to remoue in haste on a sodaine, and to leave one sicke behinde him whome he loued decrelie: the ficke man callinge him by his name as he was going his way, befought him thathe would not forfake him . Agefilaus (as Hieronymus the Philosopher reporteth) turned backe Other read to againe, and fayed: O howe hard is it both to loue, and to be wife. Nowe had Agefilant fort hausepin, and two yeares in this warre, and was spoken of throughout Asia, beinge maruelously commended to the kinge him felfe, for his great honestie, his continencie, his curtesse and gesilaus sayplaine dealing. For when he rode out into the contrie with his owne trayne onely, he would euer lye in the holyest temples of the goddes : bicause he woulde the goddes them selves shoulde be witnesses of his private doinges, whereas commonly we are lothe that men shoulde see what we doe. Furthermore, amongest so many thowsande souldiers as werein his campe, there coulde hardlie be founde a worse mattriffe, then that him selfe did lyea.

pon euerie night. And as for heate and colde, he coulde as easilie awaie with either of both, as if by constitution of bodie he had bene borne to abide anie weather and season.

But about all, it was a pleasaunt fight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in Asia, when they fawe the great Lordes, the kinges Lieutenauntes of Persia, (which before were prowde, cruell, riche, and geuen to all lust and pleasure) to honor and seare a man that wenty and downe in a poore cape, beinge affrayed of euerie shorte worde that he spake like a La-

CONIAN: infomuch as many of them called to minde Timotheus the Poetes verses, who

As Mars hath no mercie, so Greece skorneth gold. Now all Asia being up and in garboile, they willingly yelding to him in every place, after E he had taken order with the cities, & had stablished the liberty of their comon weale, without any bloodshed, or banishment of any person: he determined to goe further, into the land, and transporting the warres from the sea coastes of GRECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper person, and with the wealth & happines of the ECBATANIANS and the Sysianians, and by that meanes to take his leafure from him, who fitting still before, made the GRECIANS make warre one with an other, by force of money, corrupting the Gouernours of euery citic. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN unto him, and brought him newes how Spar-TAWas grieuously troubled with warres, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: &that therefore the Ephori did fend for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his contrie.

Ah voretched Greece, hovv cruell flaughters haft Thou brought upon thee, for to lay thee wvaft?

Peraduenture this is not to be marueled at in Agefilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in great battell fought by the citie of CORINTHE, where were many worthie and valliant Cantaines slaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS: he seemed not to rejoice at it. but rather to fetche a grieuous figh, faying. O poore GRECE, how vnfortunate art thou to have

flaine with thine owne handes so many valliant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioynine together, might at one field have ouercome all the barbarous people. The Phars allansha rying and troubling the rereward of Agefilans armie, he put foorth five hundred horsemen which gaue them so lustie a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, hefe vp tokens of triumphe apon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victory pleased him a aboue all the rest, bicause with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of him selfe, he had ouerthrowen the glory & pride of the enemies horsemen in battell, where of they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vino him, fent of purpose from Sparta, to commaund him immediatly to inuade B OF OT IA with his armie. Nowe though Agesilans intended some other time with a greater power to enter BOE OTIA, yet bicause he would not disobey the counsells commaundement of Sparta; he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of Asia, was at hande, and therefore he fent for two companies of them which lay in campe by CORINTHE, The LACEDEMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honor Agefilaus for that he had obeyed their commaundement fo readily: proclaimed in the citie, that as many young men as wereden c rous to goe aide the king, should come and enter their names. In the meane time. gefilaus passed through the contrie of THER MOPYLES, and coasting ouer the lande of Pro-CYDE, confederates to the LACED EMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHERONEA: where immediatly after his arrivall, he fodainly faw the funne eclipsed and darkened in the facion of a new moone. and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. These newes were very heatie vnto him, both for respect of the person his kinseman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the The Hands of common wealth. Neuerthelesse, searing his souldiers would be discoraged with the news, D and become faint harted, being ready to joyne battell he commaunded them that came from the sea, to brute abroade a contrarie tale to that they tolde him, and he him selfe to make good their speache, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and didlacrifice to the goddes, as thanking them for the good newes, sending to every one of his frends a peece of flesh facrificed, as he commonly vsed to doe, in any publike cause of iov. Then marching forward, he straight discouered his enemies farre of, and they likewise him & therupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading him felle the right wing. The Theban's on thother side, placed them selues in the right wing of their armie, and gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Agefilaus fide, wryteth that he neuer knewe of the like fielde fought. At the first onset, the conflict wasnot E great betwene both, neither helde long, bicause the Thebans brake the Orchomenians straight, and Agesilaus the ARGIVES. But when either side understoode that the left winges of their battells were in great distresse, and that they turned their backes: they returned sodainly againe. And where Agefilaus might eafily have had the victory without any daunger, if he had fuffred the squadron of the enemies to passe by him, and afterwards to have charged themin the rereward: of a noble corage to shew his valliantnes, he gaue charge apon the voward, to haue honor in ouercoming them. The THEBANS on the other fide no leffe valliantly received him, & fought lustely on all hands: but the cruellest fight was about Agesilans person, with the fifty young men that were fent to gard him, who shewed the selues very valliant. Agesilans was fore hurt, notwithstanding their valliant resistance, his armor being passed thorow with their F pikes & swords in fundry places: whereupon they enuironned him round amongst the, & kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of the, & many of them selues also being killed.

A Infine, finding the THEBANS too strog in the voward they were forced to do that which they refused at the first: and opening them selues, gaue them passage thorow them. So when they were paffed them, the Spartans perceiuing howe lotely and diforderly they marched, as thinking them selues out of all daunger, followed them, and gaue charge apon their flancke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they rejoycing for their victorie at this batrell, retired faver and foftely vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Agefilaus, notwithstanding he Heliconmons. was very fore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreffed The worthing

The next morning by breake of day, Agefiland defirous to fee if the THE-RANS had any corage to come downe to fight againe: commaunded his fouldiers to put garlandes apon their heades, and his musitians to sounde their shalmes or pipes, whilest he did fette vp a token of triumphe as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies fendinge to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he graunted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the citie of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a folemne procession and common facrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth parte of all his spoyles which he had brought out of Asia, which amounted to the summe of an hundred talentes. This thing done, he returned into his contrie, where he was greatly honored and esteemed of all his citizens and contrie men, for his orderly life and noble behaviour : for he was no chaungeling, but the felfe fame man in state The confluence & condicion that he was before he tooke his iorney. A Canathrum in LACE+ Canathrum DEMON, is a kinde of coche or charret after the likenesse of griffins', hartes, or goates: a- what it is, pon the which they caried younge wenches in folemne processions in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agefilaus: and Dicaarehus also was much offended, that they neither knewe Agefilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we finde in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Agessians wives name was cleare, the

fter Cynifca to fend her coche and coche horses to the Olympian games to runne for the best tern prife, only to let the GRECIANS fee that it was no act of any vertue, but simply of riches and cost. Furthermore having Xenophon the Philosopher about him, whome he loued and made Xenophon, great account of, he perswaded him to send for his sonnes to LACED & MON, that they might great about be brought vp there, where they should learne the noblest science that men coulde possiblie Agestians. learne, to write : to obey, and to commaunde. For in these LACONIAN loues there was no manner of dishonestie offered, but a true affection and honest regarde to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honest condicions: as we have more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus, Ageslaus by this meanes havinge the whole authoritie (aboue all men in the citie) in his handes: (Telemias, A. made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by sea, and him selfe with the armie by land wento beliege the citie of CORINT HE, where with his brothers helpe by fea he tooke the long walls of the same. fecond time ouercome. Whereupon Agefilaus fayd, that the ARGIVES shewed them selves rancke cowardes, that esteeming so much (as they did) these playes and sacrifices, they dust not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For him selfe, touchinge such like sportes and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, & not to be too curious. Forhe was contented to honor such solemne affemblies and common feastes with his presence, as were commonly vsed in Sparta, & tooke great pleasure to see the sportes between the yong boves and girles of Sparta: howbeit touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent stage player (wonderfully esteemed of among the GRECIANS for a singular man in that arte) E meeting Agesilaus on a time, at the first did his duetie to him, and then arrogantly thrust him felfe among ethem that walked with him, thinking the king would have made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenaunce to him, in the end he asked him: O king Agelilans, doe you not know me? Agefilaus looking apon him, aunswered: what, art not thou Callipides the stage player? And so made no further account of him. An other time beinge desired to heare a man that naturally counterfeated the nightingalls voyce : he would not heare him, faying, I have oftentimes heard the nightingall it selfe. An other time also when Menecrates the Phisitian (hauing by good fortune cured a desperate disease) called him selfe Impiter, and arrogantly vsurped that name, presuminge in a letter he wrote vnto Agesilaus, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Agefilaus, greeting: Agefilaus wrote againe vn- F to him, Agefilaus vnto Menecrates * health. So, whilest Agefilaus was in the territorie of Coprefumptions. RINT HE (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his fouldiers forraging & spoiling

A the contrie rounde about : Ambassadors came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwayes hated the THEBANS, and belides that thought it then very requisite for the good successe of his doinges, to make light of it : seemed as he neither heard nor faw them that spake vnto him. But euen at that very instant, as by diuine renenge to crie quittance, there fell a great mishappe vpon him. For before the Ambassadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bandes called the mothers, were flaine enery man by Iphicrates: which was the greatest losse that they in long time before had susteined. For they lost a great number of valliant souldiers, all naturall LACED & MONIANE: who heing well armed euery man, were flaine by naked or light armed hierlinges. Thereupon Agesilaus went straight into the field with hope to saue them, or at the least to be reuenged. But a receiving certaine intelligence by the way that they were all slaine, he returned againe to the remple of Juno from whence he came, and then fent for the Ambassadors of the Bobotians, to geue them audience. But they, to requite his former disdaine vnto them, made no manner offpeache of peace, but onely requested him to fuffer them to enter into CORINTHE. Ageslaus being offended, aunswered them: if it be to see your frendes triumphe of their victorie.ve may fafely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaffadors with him. hedestroyed the CORINTHIANS contrie, even to the walles of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaffadors fee, that the citizens of Corint He durst not come out into the field to defend their contrie: he gaue them leave to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowen, which by flight had escaped : he brought them into LACED & MON a-C. gaine, alwayes remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, bicause the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) should not reloyce at their losse. After this vovage. to gratefie the ACHAIANS, he entred in with them into the contry of ACABNANIA, & brought Agefilam ogreat spoyles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battel. Moreouer, when the A CHA- Mercane the IANS befought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from fowing of their grownd: he made them aunswere he would not. For slayde he, they will be afraide of warre the next yeare, when all their fieldes shall be sowen with corne: and so in deede it came to passe. For the army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the king of PERSIAES armye, being Lordes of part of his shame: for Antalcidas that was his enemie, sought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he faw warre did daily increase the authoritie, honor, and fame of A-being asked in great anger, at whose commaundement he had done that sodaine enterprise:

to lay all the suspition of the facte apon him: Agesilaus for Phaebidas discharge, letted not open-the sea without let of any, destroyed and spoyled all the coast of LACONIA. Moreover, the city D of ATHENS did reare up her walls againe by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereuppon the LACED EMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of Persia, and to that ende fent Antalcidas Ambassadour vnto Tiribazus, most shamely and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whose libertie Ageflaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Agefilaus happe not to be foyled with any gefilaus. Notwithstanding, he aunswered one then, that reproued him for that the LACED .E-HONIANS did fauor the Medes: no, sayd he, they do not so, but the Medes doe play the La-CED & MONIANS. Neuertheles, threatning warreto all the GRECIANS, which would not agre to the conditions of this peace: he compelled them to yeld vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But furely he did this chiefly for respect of the THEBANS, to thende that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to fet the contry of Boho Tinat libertie againe, should be so much the weaker. This plainly appeared soone after by that that followed. For Phabidas Phabidas pof having committed a fowleacte, in open peace to take the castell of the citie of THEBES, called select fallow Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPART ANS them selves also not being very well pleased withall, and those specially which were Agesilaus enemies) Phaebidas for his contry to do it of his owne head without commaundement. All this notwithstanding. he was wont to fay in private talke, that inflice was the chiefest of all vertues, and therefore Agrilland

And to them that tolde him, the great king will haue it so: Why, saydhe and wherein is he better then my felfe, if he be not infter? Iudging very wifely therein, the they should esteeme a king (whether he were of great or small power) by his justice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded the king of Persia having fenthin a prinate letter desiring his frendshippe, Agesslaus refused it, saying that common frendshippe was enough between them, and that they should neede none other, so long as that was kent But this notwithstanding, when it came to the poynt of performance, he went from his lift good opinion, and gaue place to his will & ambition, specially against the THEBANS, at that time when he did not only faue Phaebidas, but also procured the citie of Sparta to takethe fault apon them which he had committed, and to instific it, by keeping the castle of Cadmes ftill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernours of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phelia das came by the castell of Cadmea, and possessed it. Thereupon enery man thought straight that Phabidas was he that had put the matter in execution, & that Agefilans gaue the counfel to do it: as thinges falling out afterwardes, did manifestly proue the suspicion true. For after that the THEBANS had driven the garrison of the LACED EMONIANS out of the castell of Cadmea, and restored their citie againe to libertie, burdening them that they had traiterous ly slaine Archias and Leontidas (who in deede were tyrannes, though in name Gouernors) he

At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrius, of the contrarie faction vnto Agefilaus, and was then Gouernour in the citie of THESPIES, a valliant and stowt man of his handes, but euer fuller of vaine hope, than of good judgement. He defiring fame, and supposing that Phaebidas came to dignitie and great estimation through his valliant enterprise at THEBES: perswaded him selfe that he shoulde winne much more honor, if of him felfe he tooke the hauen of Piræa fodainly stealing apon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them of by that meanes from al trade by fea. It was thought commonly that this was a practife deutled by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernours of Bonoria, D who had allured certaine men to faine them selues very deuout and frendly to the LACEDE-MONIANS. These men praising and extollinge Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none so worthie as him selfe alone, to take in hand so noble an enterprise. Thus by their perswasions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vilenes was nothing inferior vnto that tretcherous winning of the castell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leffe hardines and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of Thriassum, where he made account to have bene at the walles of Piræa by night. Furthermoreit is reported, that the men he brought with him seeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all afrayed and amazed: yea he him selse also sainted perceininghe was discourred, and so returned backe with shame and dishonor to the citie of THESPIES, E Sphedrias ac- without any exployt done, fauing only a little spoyle taken. Thereupon accusers were straight cofed fires fent from ATHENS VIITO SPARTA, who apon their arrivall found that they needed not to accuse him, for that the counsell and Gouernours of the citie had already sent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of hie treason, But he durst not returne to Sparta, fearing the furie of his contriemen, thinking in deede that they would feeme as though the wronge had bene done to them, bicause it should not be thought that they had caused it to be done. This Sphodrius had a sonne called Cleonymus, a very fayer boy, with whome Archidamus (Agestlan sonne) was farre in loue : who then was maruelous sorie to see this boy he loued, in so great daunger to lose his father, & yet durst not be seene to helpe him, bicause Sphodrias was one of Agefilaus aduerfaries. Notwithstanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in F his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Agefilaus (whome they feared aboue all men elfe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durft not breake the

a matter to him: in fine, the day of the next festion being at hand, when judgement should be Home Sobiegener of Sphodrias, he boldly ventered to rell him, howe that Cleanymus had prayed him to be driamas for an humbler futer to him touching his fathers fact. King Cleombrotus by chaunce was at that time in the contrie of Pho D CIDE with his armie, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he should forthwith spoyle the THE-BANS contrie: and therewith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fansie to the iorney, and were loth to make warre with them, but yet durft not refuse to goe, nor disobey the LACED EMONIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many signes presaging ill lucke, as we have wrytten in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this warre all that he could: Agesilans would needes forward, hoping he had nowe found oportunity to be reuenged of the THEBANS, fith all GRECE besides was in peace and at libertie, them selves onely exempted from treateof peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very shortnes of time, that made it manifest enough that this warre was begonne in a geere, without any manner of reason. For the E generall peace amongest the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, monianuflaine and the LACED & MONIANS WERE QUERCOME at the battell of LEVCTRES the fifteene of lune as the bassell so as there was but twentie dayes between them. At that time by chaunse there was a common feast day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of straungers that came to see the daunses & sportes of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arrived that brought the newes of the battell loft at LEVCTRES. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valliantnes, and his authoritie was fuch thereby, that they did not onely vie him in warre, as their king and soueraine Cap-

If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houses, for any matter of necessitie: ye should see him looke so heavily and sad, that he durst not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Besides all this, euen amongest the women there was greater difference. For the mothers of the that kept their sonnes which The fortinade came from the battell, were fad and forowfull, and spake not a word. Contrarily, the mothers of the Sparian of them that were flaine, went frendly to vifite one an other, to reloyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates beganne to forsake them, and did dayly looke that Etaine; but in ciuill causes also wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduife. As they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at Sparta Trefantas, (being a great number of them, and Trefantas be men of the noblest houses and of greatest power within the citie) least they should moue some faint barted flurre or commotion among them. (For by lawe, they can beare no office in the common men wealth. It is shaine and reproche to geue them any wines, and also to marrie any of theirs. This againe did a litle revine the citie of Spart a with some hope, to make that it should not vtterly dispaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the contrie of LACONIA, with fortie thowfand footemen well armed, besides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoyle: so that in all, there were about three score and imadeth Latenne thowfande fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was well neere conia with fixe hundred yeares fith the DORIANS pofferfed LACEDEMON, and in all that time till then three fore &

all that came in their way, enen vnto the riner of Euroras, and hard adioyning vnto Sparre and no man durst come out to refust them. For Agesilaus (as Theopompus wryteth) would the fuffer the LACED & MONIANS to goe out to fight against fuch a tempest and furie of warrely hauing fortified the middest of the citie, and garded enery end of the streetes with souldiers he paciently bare all the bragges and threates of the THEBANS, which challenged him outm fight, and bad him come into the fielde to defende his contrie, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, having him selfe procured this warre. If this went to Agesilaus hart, no lesse grieuous were these troubles to him that rose within the citie. As the cries and running toe and froe of the old men, which were mad to see that they did before their eyes: and offer women also, which no grounde nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as straughtof their wittes, to heare the noise the enemies made, and to see the fire which they raised all the fieldes ouer. reason of the snowe waters that fell aboundantly : which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldnes, then roughnes of the same, in passing it ouer. Some shewing Agelitaus how Eseminond as marched formost before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer of him, faving neuer a word but this onely: O, what a noble fellowe is that ? Epaminonda i having done all that he could possible to geue the LACED & MONIANS battell, even within the citie selfe of Sparta, that he might there have set vp some tokens of triumphe, he could neuer intife Azelilaus to come out of his forte: wherefore he was driven in the ende to departe thence, and so went to destroy all the rest of the contrie. There fell out a conspiracie of two hundred men in Spart a, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the citie where the temple of Diana stoode, called Isforium, a place of strong scituacion, and ill to distresse. Hereuppon the LACED & MONIANS in surie would straight have fet apon them. But Agesslaus fearing great mutinie and sturre apon it: commaunded that no man should sturre: and him selfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them A fine dewife that had taken that strength: Sirs, ye have not obeyed my commaundement. This is not the E place I appointed you to affemble in, neither all of you in one place : for I willed you to difperfe your felues, some one way, some an other way, shewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing these wordes, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied and so leaving that strength, went into those partes of the citie that he had shewed them, 4gesilam then bringinge others thether, possessed the forte of Issorium, and tooke sisteene of those conspiratours, and put them to death the next night followinge. Howebeit then there brake out an other conspiracie farre greater than the first, of the Spartans them selves which were fecretly gotten together into a house, to make some sodaine sturre and garboyle, and to punish them in so great a trouble, it was hard: on thother side to neglect it, the conspiracie was ouer daungerous. Agesslaw having consulted with the Ephori, did put them all to F death, without any judgement of lawe, neuer Spart and before them suffering death, with out due order of law. Howebeita Thespian called Euthynus, as Callifthenes fayth, (or as Xenophus writeth, a CRETAN,) brought Agesilaus newes of it : who dispatched a horseman straight to advertise them of the citie of SPARTA, and marching forward him selfe to returne, staved not longe after before he arrived. He was no fooner come, but incontinently also came the THE BANS, who passing ouer the river of Eurotas, gave assault to the city. Then Agesilans per-Agefilaus re-pulfed Epaus-nondas from ceiuing that there was no more place nor time of securitie as before, but rather of despera

After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS hauing taken peace generally amongest them, Agesilans would needes exclude the Massa-NIANS from being fworne to this peace, faying: that they neede not fweare, bicause they had no city. Now, for a fmuch as all the GRECIANS els did receive them as among eft the number, E & tooke their othe vnto this peace: the LACED & MONIANS brake of from this general peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the Massanians contrie, andali through the allurement of Agesilaus, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS 2 cruell and vnfatiable man for warres, to deale fo craftily, and all to breake this generall league.

Againe, he brought him selfe in discredit with all men, beinge compelled to make his cite bare of money, borowing of them still, and raising fundrie contribucions amongest them: whereas in deede it had bene his best way to have ended all those miseries, having so happie an occasion offred at that time, & not to haue lost so great an Empire of so many townes and cities, both by sea and lande, and all to plague his contrie, to winne the lande and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue him F selfe vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the EGIPTIANS, euerie man thinking it a shamefull parte of him, that fuch a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of all the GRECIANS, and the

which had filled the worlde with reporte of his fame and glorie) (hould for money let out his nerson to hyre, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traitor and rebell to his impe and maifter, to become a mercenarie Captaine and souldier to doe him service. And moreover, he being now foure score yeares of age and vpwardes, his bodie all mangled with woundes, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recourse of the libertie of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition descrued some blame : for noble actes have their rime, yearather the good and ill doe nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Agesilans had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of thame in seruice, specially for benefitte of the common wealth, but perswaded him selfe that it was a dishonor to him to live idlely in a citie and doe nothing, till death should come and make his summones: R thereupon therefore he leuied men of warre through all GRECE with the money Tachos fent

unro him, and with them tooke fea, having thirtie SPART ANS counfellers and affiltantes to him, as he had in his first iorney. Now Agesilaus being arrived in Egipt, all the chiefe Capraines and Gouernours of king Taches came to the fea thore, and honorablic received him: and not they only, but infinite numbers of E GIPTIANS of all fortes (that were maruelous defirous of him, for the great fame that went abroade of Agefilaus) came thither from all partes rosee what manner of man he was. But when they sawe no stately travne about him. but an olde graybeard layed on the graffe by the fea fide, a litle man that looked fimplie of the matter, and but meanely apparrelled in an ill fauored threed bare gowne : they fell a laughing at Agefilaus dehim, remembring the merie tale, that the mountaines should bring forth, and was deliuered Egiptians, of a moufe. Befides all this, they wondered when they fawe men bring him prefentes to wel-ning fooken at that time with Tachos, who was affembling his armie to goe on his iorney: he was not made chieferaine generall, as he looked he should have bene, but was appointed only Colonell of all the straungers, Chabrias Generall of all the armie by sea, and the chiefe of rebelled against him, and being chosen king by the Egiptians, he sent vino Agestians, and prayed him to come and take his parte. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, and braved him to joyne with him, promiting great rewardes vnto them both. Tachos vnderstanding that befought them both that they would not for sake him, Chabrias for his parte allowed likewife intreate Agesilaus, and perswade him what he coulde, to continewe frendshippe with Taches Agefilans aunswered him, for thee, Chabrias, thou camest of thine owne good will, and there-E fore mayest doe what thou thinkest good: but so is it not with me. For Lam seat hither a Captaine by my contrie, to ferue the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honeftie for me to make warre with them, whome I am fent to ferue and aide: were it not sharthey them felues which fent me, doe nowe commaunde me the contrarie. This aunswere being made, he lent certaine of his men to Sparta to accuse Tachos, and to commende Nestanebos, Both they also for their partes fent to intreate the counsell of LACEDE MONE the one as being alwayes their frende and confederate, and the other promifing to be their faithfull frende thencefoorth. The LACED EMONIANS having heard the requestes of both, aunswered them openly, that Agefilaus shoulde consider of this matter: and wrote secretile to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the common wealth of Shart A. So Agesilans taking decilians for with him the mercenarie fouldiers which he had brought out of GRECE, went vnto Netta- faketh Tanebos, cloking his departure, that it was for the benefitte of his contrie, to bewray, a wicked charge goth thing: but in deede taking away the visard to benefit his contries they might by a better name nebot.

But noweon the other fide, there role another Kinge in the citie of MENDES, against this Nettanebas who havinge leavied to the number of a hundred thowlande fightinge men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encorage Agefilam, tolde him, that in deede they were a great number of men of all fortes together, and speciallie men of handie craft, and there. fore that they were not to be feared, bicause they knewe not what warre ment. But Ages law aunswered him againe : it is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and ve-In whom fire- skillfullnesse, which is hardest of all to deceive. For warlike stratageames doe most prevaile a tagemetrate against men that have greatest seare and experience : and therefore they foresce one thing rather then an other. But men of no judgement nor experience, neither feare daunger, nor haue forecast, and therefore doe geue him no more aduantage that seeketh to deceive them. then the wraftler by flight is able to ouerthrowe him, whome he can not sturre nor remove Afterwardes the MENDESIAN king him selfe sent vnto Agesilaus, to winne him if he could

Neltanebos then beganne to be affrayed. For when Agelilaus counselled him to trye it be battell as soone as he could, and not to prolonge this warre against ignoraunt menthat had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouermultitude, might intrenche him rounde about, and preuent him in divers thinges : then he beganne to feare and suspect him more, and thereuppon retyred into a great citie well walled about, and of great strength. Agesilam beinge C offended that he mistrusted him thus, tooke it inwardlie: but being ashamed to turne againe vnto the third, and also to departe without any exployte done, he followed him, and enclofed him felfe within those walles. The enemies pursuinge him hard, came vnto the citie. and beganne to entrenche it rounde, to keepe him in. Then the Egyptian Nectanebosfesring a longe fiege, determined to geue them battell. Thereto the hyered GRECIANS gave consent, as desiringe no better matche, and the rather also for that there was but small store of come within the citie. But Agefilaus perswadinge the contrarie, would in no wise confent to it : whereuppon the EGYPTIANS thought worse of him then before, and plainely called him traytor to their kinge. Howebeit he did pacientlie beare all their accusations, expectinge time to performe an exployte he entended, which was this. The enemies had call I a deepe trenche without, to compasse them in. When this trenche drewe neere to ende,

The fratageame of Aand that both endes lacked not much of meetinge, tarryinge till night came on, he comgainft the E. maunded the GRECIANS to arme, and to put them selves in readinesse: then he came vngrptians to the Egyptian, and fayed unto him. Loe here is an excellent occasion presented to faue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I faw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing least otherwise we shoulde have lost it. Nowe sith the enemies them selves have with their owne handes genen vs the way to fane our felues by this trenche they have cast, the which as muche as is finished thereof dothe hinder their great multitude to helpe them selues, and that which is yet left vnfinished dothe geue vs oportunitie to fight with them of euen hande : determine to shewe thy valure, and followinge vs, saue thy selfe and thy peo-B ple. For the enemies which we shall affayle before vs, shall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trenche which defendeth vs on our fide, can no way hurte vs. Nectanebos hearinge his wordes, wondered at his great wisedome, and so thrustinge inamonge the GRECIANS, did affayle the enemies: the which were foone ouerthrowen and put to flight, as many as durst resist, and make heade against them. Agefilans hauinge wonne Nectanebos againe to trust him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like subtiltie wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knewe not howe to auoyde. For one while he made as though he fled, and intifed them to followe him: fodainely againe he woulde turne this waye and that waye. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a straight fluce, walled about of either side, with great broade ditches full F of runninge water: fo that when they were even in the middest of it, he fodainely stopped their passage with the fronte of his battell, which he cast to the breadthe of the sluce, made some small resistaunce, in the ende turned their backes and fled, and left a great number flaine in the fielde: the refidue after that last overthrowe for looke their Captaines, and fled Graplingly here and there. Thus the affaires of this Egypt LANking after that time had good fucceffe, and was quietly stablished in his kingdom, making much of Agesilance: and doing him all honor possible, prayed him to tarie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needes haflen home to his contrie, which was in warre with others, knowing that his citie of SPARTA was without money, bicause they were driven to geve pay vnto straungers. THE LIFE

The father of sed in Rome.

He Romanes iceme to naue joueu rompe, inclining the felfe affection that Frometheus in the tragedie of AEfchylus appearance the was deliuered by him reth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him: when he favd.

So great a hate I bare not to the father. But that I love the sonne of him much rather.

For the Romanes neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, than they did vitto Strauge rumper, to the lined, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for in deede he have cooke him from

was a noble Captaine: but being striken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his bodie lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villannie. Contrariewise, neuer any other Romane (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest goodwilles so soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersity continued lenger constant, then vnto Pompey. One only cause procured the fathers hate, and that was: an unfatiable and greedy desire of money, But Pompey his fonne, was for many occasions beloued. As, for temperance of life, apmesse to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnes of word, and curtefie in conversation: so that there E was neuer man that requested any thing with leffe ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and tooke with great The favor of honor. Furthermore, being but a childe, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good willes before he spake: for his countenaunce was sweete, mixed with grauetie, & being come to mans state, there appeared in his iesture and behauiour, a graute & princely maiestic. His heare also stoode a litle vpright, and the cast and soft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblaunce (as they sayd) of the statues and images of king Alexander. And bicause euerie man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it him selse: insomuch as there were some which sportingwise did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucius Philippus a Consull, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruel if he be- F ing Philip, did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtifan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which the had with Pompey beinge a younge man a relling that after the had layen with him, the could not possible rife from him a but the must needes geue him some sweete quippe or pleasaunt taunte. She woulde tell also howe one of Pampers familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in love with her, and was & maruelous earnest futer to obtaine her good will: and that the aunswered him flatty. The would not, for the love the bare to Pompey. Geminius thereuppon brake the matter to Pompey him felfe. Pomper desirous to pleasure him, graunted the request : howebeit Geminion after that, would not come neere Flora, nor speake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtifan like, for the was ficke a long time for very griefe of minde, and the thought the tooke uppon it. All this notwithstanding, it is sayd that this Flora had then such fame for Flora the care her passing grace and beautie, that Cacilius Metellus letting foorth and beautifying the temple fing feren n of Cultor and Hollux, with goodly tables and pictures : among the reft, he caused her picture to he lively drawen for her excellent beawtie. Furthermore Pompey, against his nature, delt very haddwand vncurteoufly with the wife of Demetrius, his franchifed bondeman (who while he lived was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thow and tallentes) fearing mbetaken with her beautie which was verie fingularlie fayer, least he should be thought in love with her. Now, though herein he feemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the worst; vercould he nor thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill willers : for they did actuse hims that to pleafe and content his wines, he would let passe and winke at many thinges, that was apaintitche profit of the common wealth? he was contented with common meates: a word (they fay) he fpake when he was verie ficke; ranneed and could tast no meate, is specially noted. For, to bring his stomake to him againe, his Phifinan willed him to eate a thrushe. So feeking all about to get him one, there was no thrushe to be bought for money, for they were out of feafon. Notwithstanding, one told him that he should not misse of them at Lucullus house, for he kept them up all the yeare through. Why what then, favd he; if Lucullus ryot were not, should not Pompey line? Therewithall, letting his Phisitians counsell alone, he made them dresse such meate as was every where common it, in web facult But of that we will speake more hereafter. Now Fompey being a young man, and in the field with his father, that was in armes against Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promifed Cinna to kill him, The meaning and other confederators also had promised to fet their Captaines tent a fire. This conspiracy of Lucius To?

D was reuealed vnto Pompey as he fate at supper, which nothing amated him at all, but he dranke Pompey. freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time the stale out of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his fafetie. Terentias thinkinge the hower come to attempt his enterprife, role with his fword in his hande, and went to Pomper's bed where he was wont to lye, and gaue many a thrust into the matteresse. After he had done that, all the campe straight was in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the fouldiers in all haft would needes have gone and yeelded to their enemie , beginning alreadie to ouerthrowe their tentes, and to truffe away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durst not come out of his tent: notwithstanding Pompey his sonne ranne amongest the mutinous souldiers, and humbly befought them with the teares in his eyes, not to doe their Captaine this villanie, and in fine threwe him felfe flatling to the grounde ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them marche ouer him, if they had such a defire to be gone. The fouldiers being ashamed of their follie, returned agains to their lodginge, and chaunging minde, reconciled them felues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the worlde, Pomper beinge his heire, was accused for the father, to robbe the common treasure. Pomper as, Howebeit he consessed, and anowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchised caste for rob bondemen that had stollen the most parte of it, and brought him in before the Ludges. Note mon medical withstanding, he was accused him selfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cordes of hunters nettes, and bookes, that were taken at Asculum. He confessed the having of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had loft them fence; when Cinna returned vnto Rome with his fouldiers, who breaking into his house by force, spoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitive sentence, in which time Pompey shewed him selfe of good spirite and understanding, moretile A was looked for in one of his yeares: infomuch he wanne fuch fame and fauor by it, that Ang. fine being Prætor at that time, and judge of his matter, fell into fuch a liking with him, the fecretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by frends brokento Pompey, he liked of the match, & the parties were fecretly affured. This was not so closely conueved but the people perceined it, by the care and paines Antificas tooke to fauor his mane Infomuch, when the ludges gaue judgement, and cleered him: all the people together, and they had bene agreed, cried out with one voyce, Talaffio, Talaffio, being the viuall and conmon crie they yied of olde time at mariages in Rome. This custome by reporte of auncient folke came up in this manner. At what time the chiefest peeres and Lordes of Roma didn. uishe the Sabines daughters, which came to Rome to see common sportes played where chaunsed a fewe rascalls (as hoggeherdes or neatherdes) to carie away a goodly favering man. They fearing the should be taken from them, cried out in the streetes as they wently lassio, as if they would have sayd, she is for Talassus. This Talassus was a young gentleman well knowen, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named only, did clarine their hands for ioy, & cried out with them, Talaffio, commending the choyce they had made for him. So, hereof they fay came this custome, that ever fince they have cried this word Talaffio vnto them that are newly maried, bicause the mariage of that fayer young maid proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talafins. And this me thinkes foundeth necreft to the troth of the they reporte of this wedding crie of Talassio. Shortly after this judgement genen. Pomper maried Antestia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accused him for some C what, whereupon he being afrayed, fectetly stale away. Now when they could not finde him in Cinnaes campe, there ran straight a rumor abroade, that Cinna had put him to death, There uppon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did fet uppon him for this occasion. Buth thinking to faue him felfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a private Captaine that followed him with his fworde drawen in his hande. Cinna feeing him, fell downe on his knees be fore him, and tooke his seale from his singer wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tushe, sayd the Captaine, I come not to seale any couenann, but to chastice a villaine and cruell tyranne: and therewithall thrust his sword thorowehim, and flue him prefently. Cinna being flaine in this forte, Carbo fucceeded him, and tookethe gouernment in hande, being a more cruell tyranne than the first. Shortly after came in 894, D being wished for, and desired of the most parte of the Romanes, for the grieuous opperfions and miseries they endured, that they thought them selues happy to chaunge Gouernon for their citie was brought into fuch miferie, as hoping no more to fee Rome recouer her loft libertie, they desired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALIB called PICENVM (nowethe marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inhertaunce, but much more, great loue and good will of the cities for his fathers fake. He feeing that the noblest men of Rome for sooke their houses and goodes, to slie from all partes vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of fafetie: would not goe to him as a fugitiue and cast away to faue him felfe, without bringing him some power to increase his armie, but would honorably goe thither with an armie, as he that ment first to doe him selse pleasure. So he selt the good B Pompoutiff will of the Picentines, who willingly tooke his parte, and rejected them that were fently Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said: that Pompey which came from schoole the last day, must now in hast be a Captaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hande. After that time, Pomof an army at pey being but three and twentie yeare olde, tarying to receive no authoritie from any man, 23. years of tooke it apon him himself, & causing a tribunal to be set up in the middest of the market place of Avxinvm, a great populous city he commaunded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefest men of the citie, and they that for Carboes sake withstoode his doinges) without delay foorthwith to auoide the citie, and so beganne to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, sergeaunts of bandes, Centeniers, and such other officers as appertaine to mar. F shall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the same marches, and did the like. They that tooke parte with Carbo, fled enery man, and all the reft willingly yeelded vnto him whereby in thorte space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, cartes, and all maner of beaftes for carriage. In this forte he tooke his iorney towardes pombin soils sella not in halt, as a man affrayed to be met with by the way, but by small iotneyes, staying onto Syllat fill where he might hurt his enemy cauling the cities every where as he came to revolt trous Carlo. Neuerthelesse, three Captaines of the contrarie parte, Carinna, Galine, and Brutus, all three did fette apon Pompey together, not all in a fronte, nor of one fide, but in three feuerall places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to have made him fure at the first onfer. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, having placed his horsemen (among the which he was him selfe in person) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were G AV LES. Pompers of R comming to geue charge apon him, he ranne one of the chiefest among them through with efficies of the his launce, and flue him. The other GAV LES feeing him flaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footemen: fo that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among them selves, and some fled one way, some an other way, the best they could. Then the nwnes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare : came all in to Pomper. and welded them selves. Afterwardes Scipio the Consul comming against Pomper to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to joyne : before they came to throwing of their dances, Scipioes fouldiers faluted Pompeys men, and went on their fide. So Scipio was driven to fie. And in fine, Carbo him felfe having fent after him divers troupes of horfemen by the river of Artis: Pompey made towards them, and did fo fiercely affaile them, that he draue them into Cfuch places, as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon, they seeing no way to scape, yeelded them selves, horse and armor, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone as he winderstoode of it, searing healt Pompey thould miscarie, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies. he made halt to marche towardes him for to aide him. Rompey vnderstanding of his approache. Pompey iorcommaunded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Ge- ned with Sylnerall might fee them brauely appointed when he should present the vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would doe him great honor, & in deede he did him more honor, then Pompey looked for, For, when Sylla faw him a farre of comming towardes him, and his armie marthalled in forgood order of battell, and fuch goodly men, that fo brauely aduaunced them felues, be-Ding coragious for the victorie they had obtained of their enemies: he lighted a foote. When Pompey also came to doe his duety to him, and called him Imperator: (as much as Emperour. orfoueraine Prince) Sylla refalured him with the felfe name, beyonde all mens expectacion Pomper calpresent, litle thinking that he would have geven so honorable a name, vnto so young a man ted imperator as Fomper, who had not yet bene Senator : confidering that he him felfe did contende for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that The honor Silla gaue him euery way, was aunswerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Portigies Sylla did rule came before him, he would rife and put of his cappe to him, which he did not vnto many of ther noble men about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in him felfe. Wherefore when Sylla would straight have fent him into G AV LB, bicause Metellus that E was there, was thought to have done no exployte worthie of fo great an armie as he had with him: Pomper answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an auncient Captimethar was of greater fame and experience than him felfe. Yet if Merellus of him felfe were contented, and would intreate him: that he would willingly goe and helpe him to ende this watte. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVI to Pompey went did of him felfe wonderfull exployees, and did fo review Metelliss olde corage and valliantnes to ade Meto fight, which now beganne to faint, like boyling copper that being poored upon the colde Gaule. and hard copper, doth melt and diffolue it, as fast or faster, then fire it selfer For like as of a wreftler, who hath bene counted very ftrong, and the chiefeft in all games, hathing ener burne the price away where he hath wrestled, they never recorde among them his childishe victo-Fries and wrestlinges, as thinges of no account: euen so I am affrayed to speake of the wonder-

all that they requested of him. But for Pompey, reverencing him for his valliantnes, & thinking that he would be a great stay to him in all his warres: he fought by some meanes to allie him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to marrie AEmylia the daughter of Metella, and of her first husband, the which also was an other mans wife, and with childe by her husbande. These mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreable to Pompeys nature and condicion : to see AEmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husbande, to marrie be great with childe, and thamefully to forfake Antiftia, who not long before had loft her father and for respect of her husbande that did put her away. For Antistius was murdered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take parte with Sylla for his sonne in lawe Pompeys sale and her mother voluntarily put her selfe to death, seeinge her daughter received such open wrong. our fides ? It feemeth also that Pompey delt too cruellie with Carbo in his miserie. For fith he must needes dve, as there was no remedie but he should: then it had bene better they had kil-n led him when he was taken. For then they would have imputed it to his malice, that so had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him that had bene thrife Confull at Rome to be openly examined, and he fitting in his chaire of state of the bunall condemned him to dye in presence of them all: to the great offence and misliking of euery one that was present. Howbeit we may not gene too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, speaking of Iulius Cafars frendes or foes. For Pompey in deede was compelled to make away the greatest personages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his handes, being notoriously taken: but for the rest, all those that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was contented to winke at it, and would not understand it: and moreouer did helpe some besides to faue them selves. Nowe Pompey was determined to have taken sharpe revenge of the citie of the HIMBRIANS, which had flowtly taken the enemies parte. They fay moreouer, that at his arrivall, he had a pleasaunt chaunce happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his fouldiers stumbled on a treasure by chaunce, and got thereby a great maffe of money. The refidue of the armie hearing that. thought fure that the field where this treasure was found, was full of golde and filuer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pomper hereuppon, for many dayes after, coulde haue no rule of his fouldiers, neither coulde he choofe but laugh, to fee fo many thow lande men digging the grounde, and turning vp the fielde : vntill in the ende they wearied them felues, and came and prayed him then to lead them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their follie. Domitius came to Pompey with his Domitius army fet in battel ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quamyre before him that ran with a fwift comped by running streame, verie ill to get ouer: besides that, from the verie breake of day it had poored his arre. downe and rained fo fast, and was so great a winde withall, that Domities thinking all that day they should not fight, commaunded his people to trusse away, and remoue, Pompey on thother fide, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, sodainly made his men to march, and D paffed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiving that, being altogether out of order: were maruckelly amazed, and in that hurly burly would have made refutaunce. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly fet in battell ray, and had besides the winde beating the raine full intheir faces. So did the storme much hurt vnto the ROMANES also, for they coulde not one fee an other : infomuch as Pompey him felfe was in great daunger of being killed by one of his owne fouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and he was fomewhat long before he answered him. This commaundement, grieued him not a litle, though he made no shewe of it at all: but his food diers shewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to departe, they began to geue out broade speeches against Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (what soeuer became of them) to for sake him, and they would not that he should trustyn. to a tyran. Pompey feeing that he could not perswade them, by any reason to be quiet, rose our of his chayer, and retyred into his tent weeping. But the fouldiers followed him, and brough him againe to his chaver of state, where he spent a great parte of the day, they intreating him to remaine there & commaund them, and he desiring them to obey Sylla, and leave their mis. tinies. But in fine, seeing the importunate to presse him to it, he sware he would kill him selfe. rather then they should compell him : yet they scant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Sylla when he heard that, sayd to his frender well, then I fee it is my destiny, in mine olde dayes to fight with children. He ment so, bicause of Marim the younger, who had done him much mischiese, and had besides put him ingrea daunger. In dede it is true that Pomper him selfe being sent Proconsul into Spayne long time after that, was the last that Subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so commonly knowen and accepted, as no man did enuy it. And therefore rightly is the wisedom of the auncient Romans, to be both commended & had in admiration: which did not only reward service in the field with such honorable names & titles, but civil service and good gouernment also in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at Rould called Maximi, to fay, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement between the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that heput from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchifed, who through their riches and fauor had obtained that place. After that, Fompey required the honor of triumphe, but Sylla denied it.alleaging that none could enter in triumphe into Rome, but Confulls or Prætors. For fith Serin the first who in Spayne had ouercome the Carthaginians, neuer defired this honor of triumphe, being neither Confull nor Prætor: much leffe should he stande apon demaund of triumphe into Rome, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and befides, it would purchase him enuy of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla alleage against Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to stand in it, he would refist him. All E Pompen flows this blanked not Pomper, who told him frankely againe, how men did honor the rifing, not the fetting of the funne:meaning thereby, how his owne honor encreafed, and Syllaes diminished, Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he fayd, but perceiving by their countenaunces that stoode by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he sayd. When it was tolde him, he maruelled at the boldnes of fo young a man, and then cried out twife together, let him then triumphe a Gods name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, would needes be brought in in triumphant charriot drawen with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the city being too narrowe, he was driven to leave the Elephantes, and was contented to be drawen in with horses. Now his souldiers that had not all things as they F looked for, and which was promifed them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumphe he fayd he passed not for it, & that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumphe, & then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereuppon, there was a famous man at that time called servilius, who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeys triumphe, who sayd openlynow I know that Pompey in deede is great, & descrueth triumphe: Being enident enough, that if he would, he might then have easily bene made Senator: he sued not for that, but as they fav. fought honor by a straunger meane lesse honorable. For if he had bene made Senator so young, it had not bene to great a matter: but to have fuch honor before he was Senator, that was maruelously to be noted. But this wanne him the more fauor and good will still amongest. the common people: for they were glad when after his triumphe they faw him in companie amongest the Romane Knights. On thother side it spighted Sylls to see him come so fast forward, and to rife to fo great credit: notwithstanding, being ashamed to hinder him, he was a contented to kepe it to him felfe, untill that Pomper by force & against Syllees will, had brought

Levidus to be Confull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furdered his defire. Ther- Marine Leuppon Sylla feeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a conful great traine of followers to honor him, he fayd vnto him: O young man, I fee thou are glad of this victory, and so hast thou cause, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to have had such fanor of the people, as for thy fake to have made Lepidus Confull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the citie. For he woulde. uer houer about him, when he thought least of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of fouldiers, and would ftill lay ambushes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heavy armed. Hereuppon Pompey keping his army alway together, practifed at ROME, that he might be fent into SPAYNE to aide Metellus. But Catulus, notwithstanding that he commaunded him to disperse his army. For Metellus was very diffolute of life (which no man would have uen to you & judged in him) and was geuen ouer too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in hima maruelous fodaine chaunge both of his pompe & glory which he vsed before, as also the cuttinge of of his superstuous expence. That thinge, besides that he did honor Pampey greatly by it, wan him also much more the good will of the people, when they saw that he drew him selfe downe to a straighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne dispositionhe was a graue man, & temperatly genen for his defires. In this warre fortune chaunged dinerly, Sertorius was as it is commonly feene in warres : but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the city of LAVRON. For he thinking to have that him in, & had geven out some glorious] wordes of the matter: wondred when he saw him selfe straight compassed in that he could not fturre out of the campe where he lay, and was driven befides to see the citie burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afterwardes at a set battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he slue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable fouldiers and Sertorius Lieutenauntes, and with themten thow fand men. This victory to encoraged Pompey, that he made haft to fight with Sertorius 2lone, bicaufe Metellus should have no parte of the honor of the victory. So they both metby the river of Sucron, about funne fer, both fearing Metellus comming: the one that he might Sucron fl. fight alone, and the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doutfull in the end of the battell: for either of their winges had the upper hand. Betwene the two Captaines, Sertorine had the greater honor: for he alone ouercame all them that stoode before him. And as for B Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being a foote, came and fet yoon him, and having both their fwordes in their handes, they both lighted apon their handes, but not both in one forte: for Pompeys hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cutof. Then Pompeys men fell apon him, all his owne fellowes on that fide being fled from him: notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he saued him selfe after a straunge sorte, by casting up his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnes, having a caparison of great value: and in the meane time, while they were buffe deuiding this booty among them, and fighting for it; he scaped their handes. The next morning by breake of day, both of them against brought their bandes into the fielde, to confirme the victory, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time, whereupon Sertorius went F his way, and dispersed his army: for his campe was easily broken, & sodainly gathered against together. For Sertorius would fomtime wander the fieldes alone, and at an other time against

Pompey in the meane time having fpent the most parte of his goods in this warre, fent to Rome for money to pay his fouldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they fent him no money, he woulde returne with his armie into ITALIE. Lucullus then beinge Confull, though Pompeys enemy, procured they should fend him money: for he practifed to besent Captaine against king Mithridates, and therefore was affrayed to gene Pomper any occasion to returne, who defired nothing more then to leave Sertorius, to bend his force against

Mithridates, whose ouerthrow should be more honorable to him, and also lesse daungerous. In the meane space, Sertorius dyed, being betrayed by those whom he thought his frendes, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needes counterfeate his doinges, having the fame meanes, the fame furniture, and the fame power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit, and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towardes him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affayers: he layed a bayte for him of ten cohorts which he fent to praye in the fields, commaunding them to difperfe them selues abroad as farre as they could, one from an other. Perpenna straight tooke the occasion. and gaue them charge, and had them in chase. But Pompey tarying him at the ford, was ready for him with all his army fet in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victory, and ended all Pompey outer this warre, bicause the most of the Captaines were flaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe tame Perpen

POMPEIVS. he had put this suspicion quite out of their heades, telling them that he would dischargehin armie after he had triumphed: then his illwillers could blame him for nothingelfe, but the he was more enclined to the people then to the nobilitie, and that he had a defire to reftore the Tribuneshippe of the people, which Sylla had put downe, only to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which in deede was true. For the common people at Rous neuer longed for thing more, than they did to see the office of the Tribune sette vp againe Yea, Pompey him selfe thought it the happiest turne that ever came to him, to light in such time, to doe fuch an acte. For, had any other man preuented him of that, he coulde never haue founde the like occasion possiblie to haue requited the peoples good willes vnto him. fo much as in that. Nowetherefore, his feconde triumphe and first Consulthippe being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothinge the greater, or better man. And yet was it a shewe and signification of his greatnesse, the which Crassis (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time delt in matters of state, and made more estimacion of him selfe then of Pompey and all the rest) neuer durst once demaunde : before he had craued Pompeys goodwill. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had sought occafion of long time to pleafure him: and thereupon made earnest fute vnto the people for him. affuringe them he would as much thanke them for making Craffus his colleague and fellowe Confull, as he would, for making him felfe Confull. All this notwithstandinge, when ther were created Confulls, they were in all thinges contratie one to an other, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Confulls together. Craffus had more authority with the Senate, but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he restored them the office of the C Tribune, and passed by edict, that the Knightes of Rome should hauefull power against iudge causes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleasaunt sight also to the people, when he came vnto the Cenfors in person, to pray that he might be dispenst with for goinge to the warres. The custome For it was an auncient custome in Rome, that the Knightes of Rome hauinge served acce-

ferued, in what iorneys and contries they had bene, and hauinge also deliuered accomptos their good behauior and seruice, they then prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Nowell it appeared that they had done good feruice, there were they honorablie rewarded : orotherwise openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Censors, D ged from the being honorablic fette in their tribunall or judgement feate, taking viewe of all the Roman Knightes that mustered before them, to be seene and examined: they marueled when they Pompey sub-missesh him fawe Pampey comminge at the further ende of the market place, havinge all the market of a Confull borne before him, and him felfe leading his horse in his hande by the bridle. When Pompey came neerer, and that they fawe it was he, he commaunded his sergeauntes that caried the axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Cenfors fate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and rejoycing, being verie silent. The Censors them selves also were maruelous glad to see him so obedient to the lawe, and did him great reverence. In fine, the elder of the Cenfors, did examine him in this forte. Pompey the great, I pray thee tell me if thou haft served so long time in the warrs, E as the lawe doth appoint? Then aunswered Pompey alowde: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my selfe. The people hearing that aunswere, made an open showte for ioy, they were so glad to heare it : and the Cenfors them selues came from their iudgement feate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his house, to please the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their handes, with great fignes of ioy. At the ende of their Consulthippe, when millikinge increased further betwext Pomper and Crassus, there was one Gains Aurelius, of the order of Knighthoode, who till that time neuer spake in open affembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and tolde the people openly: how Ispiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commaunded him to tell both the Confulls from him, that they should not leave their charge and office, before they were reconciled F together. For all these wordes Pampey sturred not. But Crassus first tooke him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the people. My Lordes, I thinke not my selfe dishonored to gene a place to Pompez, fith you your felues have thought him worthie to be called the great, before he had any heare of his face, and vnto whom you graunted the honor of two triumphes before he came to be Senator. When he had fayd his minde, they were made frendes together, Pompey and and so surrendred up their office. Now for Crassis, he held on his former maner of life which frender, he had begon. Pompey as neere as he could gaue ouer to pleadmens causes any more. & began litle and little to withdraw him felfe from frequenting the marker place, and matters of judgement, comming feldome abroad, & when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rate thing also to fee him any more come out of his house, or talke with any man, but Pompey he was ever accompanied with a great number, & he reioyced to him felfe, to fee that he had pride and alwaies such a traine with him: for that made him to be honored the more, & gaue him greater a countenaunce to fee him thus courted, thinking it dishonor to him to be familiar with meane nersons. For men that rise by armes, are easily despised, when they come to live like private > rivens: bicause they can not facion them selues to be copanions with the common people. (who citizen like vie a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the city, feriors in warres: will thinke fowle scorne if they be not their superiors in peace. And by this meanes when they have a noble warrier amonge them that followeth publike causes which hath triumphed for many victories and battells he hath obtained)they obscure his glory and Yea and cotrarily, they that do acknowledge themselves to be their inmake him an vinderling vinto them: whereas they doe not otherwise enuy any fouldiers, that are contented equally to geue them place and authority, as plainly appeared (hortly after by C. Pompey him felfe. By fuch an occasion, the power of pirates on the sea tooke beginning in the The beein contry of CILICIA, which was not reckoned of at the first, bicause it was not perceived, untill ning of the

they grew bold & venturous in king Methridates warres, being hyered to do him feruice. And pirates warres afterwards the ROMANES being troubled with civill warres, one fighting with an other even at Rome gates, the fea not being looked to all this while: it fet them a gogge, and made them go further then euer they did before. For they did not only rob & spoile all marchat venterers by fea, but rifled alfo all the Ilandes & townes upon the fea coast: infomuch as then there ioyned with them, men of great wealth and nobility, & of great wisedom also, & entred into their insolancy of fellowshippe, as into a commendable faculty. Now they had set vp arsenalls or store houses in the pira fundry places, they had fundry hauens and beacons on the land, to gene warning by fire all a-D longest the sea coast, & those well kept & watcht:moreouer, they had great sleetes of shippes, ready furnisht with excellent good galliots of ores, skilfull pilots & mariners, their shippes of fwift faile, & pinnafes for discouery, but withall so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all guilt, the coueringes of the fame all of purple filke, delighting only to make a glorious show of their pillage. All the sea coast ouer, there was no fight of any thinge but musicke, singing, banketing, and rioting, prifes of Captaines, and men of great quality, & raunsomes of a thowsand prisoners: & all this was to the shame & dishonor of the Romanes. Their ships were about a thowsand in nuber, The privates & they had take aboue foure hidred townes. They had spoiled & destroyed many holy teples "naty, a thowthat had never bene touched before. As the temple of the twynnes in the Ile of CLAROS, the

E temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the city of HERMION, & the teple of Afculapius in Epidav RV mithe temples of Neptune in Isthmos, TENARIA, & CALABRIA: & the temples of Apollo in Activm, in the Heof Leve Ades: the temples of Iuno in Samos, in Argos, & in Lycania. They had also many straunge sacrifices & certen ceremonies of religion amongest the selues, in the mount Olympus, & among other, the mistery of Mithres, which is the sunne: & remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent partes and injuries they did the ROMANE'S vpon the fea, they went a land, and where they found any houses of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoiled & destroyed them: & on a time they tooke two ROMANE Prætors, Sextilius, & Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their fergeauts & officers attending on the, & caried them quite away. An other time also they stale F away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had received honor of triumphe) as flactivent a walking abroad in the fields, & she was redemed for a great summe of money. But you the greatest spight & mockery they yied to the Romanas, was this. That when they had take any of them and that he cried he was a citizen of Rome, and named his name: then they made as though A they had bene amazed, and affrayed of that they had done. For they clapped their handes on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgeue them, The poore prisoner thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled them selves as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, & put shooes on his feete others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the Romane facion, for feare, (fayd they) leaf he (hould be mistaken an other time. When they had played all this pageant, & mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their shippe ladders, and put him on it, & bad him go his way, he should have no hurt : and if he would not goe of him selfe, then they cast him ouer the bord by force, and fent him packing. These rouers and sea pirates had all the sea Mediterraneum at commaundement: infomuch there durst not a marchant looke out, not a once traffique that sea. And this was the only cause that moved the Romanes, searing sears. tv of vittells, and a great dearth) to fend Pompey to recouer the fignory againe of the fea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall, or Generall by sea, but should have absolute power to commaunde all manner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doinges in his charge Gabinius Law Was Gabinius, Pompeys frend. The fumme of this decree gaue him full power and absolute authority of all the sea from Hercules pillers, and of the maine land, the space of source hundred furlong from the sea. (For the ROMANE's dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations & mighty kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the Senate fifteene Lieutenauntes, to geneva-C to enery one of them, severall provinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also take money out of the treasure, of the Generall receivers of the state, to defray the charges of a fleete of two hundred faile, with full power besides to leavy what men of warre he thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he lifted. This law when it had bene read onceouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceede all enuy, but also that it gave them apparant cause of seare, to gene such absolute power vnto a prinate person. Whereapon, they were all against it but Cafar, who favored the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey, as the people, whose fauor he sought. The noble men fell maruelously out with Pomper. and at the length one of the Confulls was very hotte with him, and told him he looked to fol-D low Romalus steppes, but peraduenture he would come shorte of that end he made. Thereapon the people thought to have killed him. After that, Catulus stoode vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, bicause he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuy, to speake many goodly thinges in the praise of Pompey, and in fine. aduised the people to spare him, and not to venter in such daungerous warres (one after another) a man of so great accompt, as they ought to make of him. If ye chaunce to loofe him, fayd he:whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your felfe, Then perceiuing that he lost his labor, seeking to turne the people from their determination: he lest it there, and fayd no more. Roseius rose next after him to speake, but he could have no audience. When he saw that he coulde not be heard, he made a signe with his singers, that they shoulde not geue Pompey alone this authority, but ioynean other with him. The people being offended withall made fuch an outcrie vppon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place As the vorce at that instant, was striken blinde, & fell downe amongest the people. Whereby it appeareth, that fowle falling out of the ayer to the ground, do not fall for that the ayer is broken or pearced with any force or fury: but bicause the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with fuch a violence, as it maketh a very tempest in the ayer) doth strike & ouercome them. Thus for that day, the affembly brake vp, and nothing past: and at the day appointed when this decree should passe by voyces of the people, Pompey went abroad into the contry. There being aduertised that the decree was past for the confirmation of his charge, he returned agains that feene them sun out of all partes of the city vnto him, to have waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and facrificed to the goddes: and audience being genen him at an

A open affembly, he handled the matter fo, that they gave him many thinges besides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation fer downe and appointed at the first decree. For Pompey prehe ordained that the common wealth should arme him fine hundred shippes, & they leavied paration afor him fixe score thowsand sooremen, and five thowsand horsemen, and chose besides source rate. and twenty Senators, which had every one of them bene Generalls of armies, and two generall Treasorers also. While thinges were thus a preparing the price of vittels fell by chaunces which reioyced the people so much, that they stucke not to say, that the name of Penters only had already ended this warre. This notwithstanding, he deuided all the sea between the lands into thirteene regions, and in enery of them he appointed a certaine number of his thippes, and moreouer, one of his Lieutenauntes ouer them. Thus having disperfed his power all a-R broade, he brought all the pirates shippes that were in a fleete together, within his danneers and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that bad difeerfed them selues betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase: they sed all inin Cilicia, as bees into the beehiue, against whom he would needes go him selfe in person with three score of his best shippes. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had scored all the Thuscane sea, the coastes of Lybia, Sardinia, Sicile, and of Corres of all these theeues which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within forty, dayes foace taking infinite paines, both him felfe and his Lieutenaunts. Now when one of the Confulls called Pifo did all the best he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had discharged his ower men, for that he enuied Pompeys prosperity: Pompey sent his shippes before to make towardes IT ALIB to arrive at the city of BRYND VSIVM. He in the meane time, went through THUSCANE to ROME, where, so soone as his comming was knowed; all the people tan out to meetehim, as if he had bene absent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to fee him, was the fodaine chaunge of victals vnlooked for, that dayly came to the towne out of all partes. But Pifo went neere to be deprived of his Confulthippe: for Gabiniste had the The corresponding decree wrytten, and ready to present to the people. But Pompey would not suffer it. So, having one pile. gently brought all to passe as he desired, he went vnto the city of BRYNDVSIVM, and there tooke sea, and hoysed sayle. Now though his hasty voyage, and shortnesse of time made him palle by many good cities without comming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so passeby the city of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had sacrificed to the goddes, retur-D ned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the city, he red two wrytinges that were made in his praise, the one within the gate which fayd thus.

The humblier that thou dooft thy felfe as man behave, The more thou dooft deserve the name of god to have. And the other wryting was without the gate, which fayd: We wisht for thee, we wast for thee, VVe vvorship thee, we want on thee. Nowe bicause Pompey having taken certaine of these rouers by sea that kept together, did viethem gently when they required pardon, and having their shippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercy, fled E from his other Captaines and Lieutenauntes, and went and yeelded them felnes, their wives and children into his handes. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of them felues, and by that meanes he came to have knowledge of the rest, and to followe them where they went, whome he tooke in the ende : but knowinge that they deserved no pardon, they hid them schies. Yet the most parte, and the richest of them, had conveyed their wives, children and goodes, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into strong castells and litle townes apon mount Taurus: and fuch men as were able to cary weapon, imbarked, and lay before acity of Coracustum, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell, first by sea, and there were ouercome, and afterwardes they were befieged by lande. Howebeit shortly after, they prayed they might be received to mercie, and thereupponyeelded their bodies, townes, and llandes which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worse to haue approached. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirates in leffe then three monthes driven from The village the fea wherefocuer they were. He wanne also a great number of other shippes, besides foure of Pomper to them selues too vnthankefull : but that which most grieued them, was to see Rompeys power

fcore and tenne gallies armed with copper spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken. (who were in number aboue twenty thowfand persones) he did not only consider when ther he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise parte on thother side to let them goe at liberty, to gather force againe, being so great a number of them as in deede they were and all poore men and fouldiers. Therefore, weying with him felfe, that man by nature is an borne a wild or fauage beaft, but contrarily becommeth a brute beaft chaunging nature whi he falleth to vice : and againe is made tame and civill in time, chaunging place and maneral life: (as brute beaftes that being wilde by nature doe also become gentle and tractable, with gentler vsageby continuance) he determined to draw these pirats from the sea into thupland and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine small townes of the CILICIANS, that were feant inhabited, & were very glad of the, geuing them land to keepe them with. The conof the Southens also, that not long before had bene destroyed by Tigranes the king of Anne NIA, being desirous to replenish that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed uers also in the city of DYMA in the contry of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants and had great store of very good land. Now therefore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest frendes milliked him. Force Pompey land tellus that gentle person, (a cosen to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made warns in Spatnewith him against Sectorius) was sent Prætor into C RET A, before Pompey was chosen Generall against the pirates. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was even a seconde denne of pirates. Metellus finding there a great number of these theeues, tooke many of them, and put them to death, euen all that came to his handes. Then, fuch as had fcaped from him, being straightly befieged, sent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercie: de claringe vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, bicaufell partes of that region from the sea came iust within the copasse limited him on the land, Pom per pardoning them apon their fubmiffion, wrote vnto Metellus, & commaunded him to leave of his warre, and therewithall charged all the cities, that they should not obey Metellus commaundementes. After that he fent Lucius Octavius, one of his Lieutenauntes, who entredimo the townes Metellus belieged, and fought for the pirates. This made Pompey not only hated & enuied, but derided also: for that vnder his name he had protected such vile theeues, that had neither God nor law, and geuen them his authority to faue their liues, for a litle enuie and e-li Achilles dif- mulacion he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles, and fay thathe shewed not the parte of a wife man, but of a young foole besides him selfe, for desire of glory, making a figne to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to strike at Hector, to thend that as Homes fayd:

Least he too late should to the battell runne. When others had the honor of it wwonne.

But Pompeys fact was worse then this. For he fought for the comon enemies of the world, and only to deprine a ROMANE Prætor of triumphe, who had done great good service to have destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not of his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by affault, he put them to death: and afterwardes hauing done Othwiss open shame through his campe, he let him goe. When newes came to Rome, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, & that Pompey having no other feruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp & downe: one Manilius a Tribune of the people, put forth an other decree vnto them of this effect. That Pompey taking all the army Lucullus had, & the provinces vnder his gouernment, with al BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: should go make warre you the kings Tieranes and Mithridates, keping in his handes notwithstanding all his iurisdiction and army by sea, in as royall maner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monante and absolute Prince, of all the Romans Empire. For by this second decree, he had all these contries not named in his former commission, added to amplifie his authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all F the armies and forces with the which he had ouercomen those two mighty kinges. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the injurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, deprining him of the

an other, flowtly to withfland this edict, and not to fuffer their liberty to be loft in this forte. Notwithstanding, when the day came that the decree should passe, they were so afrayed to anger the people, that their hartes failed them, & none durft speake against it but Catalus only: that earnestly inueyed against the passing of it a long time together, & greatly blamed the The boldness people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his parte, he oftentimes of Catului in cried out to the Senate, that they should looke to seeke out some mountaine or high rocke to B retyre fafely vnto, to defend their liberty, as their ancesters had done in old time before them, law. All this prevailed not, for the decree passed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lorde almost of all that, which Sylla by force of armes and great effusion of blood (having made him selfe Lord of Rome) had before in his power. When Pompey had received letters from ROME, advertifing him what the people had past in Pompey his behalfe: fome fay that at the receite of them (in the presence of his familiar frendes that great diffirm were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruelously to have such great offices & charge layed voon him, one in the necke of an other, and burst forth in these wordes. O goddes, shall I nenersee an ende of such a worlde of troubles as I haue? Had it not bene better for me to have Chene a meane man borne and vnknowen, then thus continually to be in warre with armor on my backe? What, shall I neuer see the time, that breaking the neckes of spight and enuy against me, I may yet once in my life live quietly at home in my contrie, with my wife & children? When Pompey spake those wordes, his familiar frendes could not abide to see his deepe diffimulation, knowing that besides his natural ambition and couetous desire to rule, he was Ougrell beglad in his hart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: wist Pompey which his deedes forthwith bewrayed. For he presently sent out precepts into enery quarter, and Lucullus commaunding all fortes of fouldiers to come to him immediatly, & made also all the Princes and kinges within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the contries, altered and chaunged all that Lucullus had established before. Furthermore, he did release the D penalties enjoyined them, and tooke from them also the giftes that Lucullus bestowed of them. In fine, this was all his purpose and defire: to make them that honored Lucullus know, that he had no further power & authority to doe any thing. Lucullus finding him felfe hardly handled Pompey and by Pompey, the frends of either fide thought good they should meete & talke together: which Luculiu meecame so to passe, for they met in the contry of GALATIA. And bicause they both were great ting in Gala-Captaines of the ROMANE armies, and had done many famous acts, they had their fergeaunts &officers that carried the bundells of roddes before the, wreathed about with laurell boughs. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close & woody contry, all covered with greene wees, and Pompey on thother fide had paffed through a great fandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus fergeaunts feeing the laurell boughes drie and withered away, which E Pompeys fergeaunts caried, they gave them of their greene and fresh boughes to beawtifie the roddes and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus horior from him. In troth Lucullus had bene Confull before Pompey, & fo was he also older man then he syce the dignity of Pompey was greater, bicause he had triumphed twife. At their first meting, their enterrainment & discourse was with great ceremony and curtesie as might be, one highly praifing the others deedes, rejoycing at eche others good fucceffe: but at parting they fell to hat wordes together, Pompey vpbrayding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompey flambition, fo that

from him, leaving him only fixteene hundred, which he supposed were such as for distance and ill will they bare him, would do him but fmall feruice. Furthermore, to bleamifh the glory of his doings, he told every body Lucullus had fought with the pompe & shadow only of the s two kinges, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithriday being then prepared for warres, with shieldes, swordes, and horses. Lucullus for revenue on the other fide fayd, that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of warre, like a cowardly buf. fard that prayeth vpon dead bodies, which others have flaine: & to cut a funder the remaine of this warre ended by an other, as he had done before, attributing the honor of the ours throw of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to him felfe, where in deede Metellus, Crassus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therfore it was no maruell, that he fought the glory and he

at Mithridates, that he could not finde that out in all the time he lay there. In thend, he went and camped rounde about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owned campe: who after he had abidden the fiege fine and forty dayes, fled away with all the choice of his army, vnknowing to Pompey, having first slaine all the sicke and impotent persons with in his campe. After that, Pompey found him an other time by the river of Euphrates, & went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would passe ouer the river before he could preuent him in time, he raifed his campe againe, & marched away at midnight. About that time, they say, that Mithridates sawe that in a dreame, which did prognosticate what should happen. He thought, that having the winde in the poope of his shippe, he was vnder faile, in the middest of the sea of Mare Bosphorum, and that he was maruelous glad of it and reiovced with them that failed with him, thinking him felfe certainly past all daunger: yetlodainly againe, that all this joy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waves of thefea. I apon a litle peece of the shippe that was broken, trusting to the mercy of the windes. Ashe was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come so neere, that there was no shift, but they must needes fight to defend their campe. Thereuppon, his Captaines straight beganne to put his men in battell ray, ready to fight. Pompey vnderstanding they prepared to make defence, was in dout to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compaffe them in to keepe them from flying, & then in the morning to fet vpon them more easily, his men being the better fouldiers. But Pompers olde Captaines were so earnestly in hand with him to perswade him they might fight, thatin the ende he was contented they should geue charge. Now it was not so darke but they could somewhat see, for the moone that was very low and vppon her setting, gaue light enough to E discerne the body of a man; yet bicause the moone was very low, the shadow which gaugout Surther farre then their bodies, came almost euen to their very enemies, which did let the that they could not certainly judge what space of ground was between them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they cast their dartes at the ROMANES, but they hurte neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The Romanes perceiuing that, ran apon them with great cries. But the barbarous people durst not abide their charge they were so affrayed, Pompey over- but turned their backes, and ranne away for life, fo that they were flaine downeright. Thus were there tenne thowsand of the barbarous people slaine and more, and their campe also uken. As for Mithridates him selfe, at the beginning of thonset, he made a lane among the Ro-MANES with eight hundred horsemen, and passed cleane through them. But incontinently his F Broficenes, men dispersed apon it, some one way, some an other way, so that he was left alone but with three persons only, whereof Hypsicrates was one of the number, which had ever bene valliant and had a mans hart : whereuppon, for that cause Mithridates called, her Hypsicrates. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene confumed and destroyed by Lucullus) understanding that Pompey was of a mylde and gentle nature, he received his garrisons into his frongest forces and royall houses, and went him selfe with his frendes and kinsemen to meete Pompey, & to yeeld him felfe vnto him. Whe he came hard to his campe, being a horse backe, Tigrane relthere came out two sergeaunts of Pompeys, & commaunded him to light and go in a foote for desh him felfe there was neuer man seene a horse backe within the Romanes campe. Then he sayd vnto them both: as for the other loffes you have fusteined heretofore, you must thanke Lucullus for them, who hath taken from you, Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Galatia, and Sophena: but for that you haue left you till my comming. I will let you enjoy it, paying to the Romanes a fine of fixe thowfand talentes for the injurie you had done them, prouided alfo, that your fonne haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his parte. Tigranes accepted the condicions of peace. The Ro-MANE s then faluted him king. He was fo glad thereof, that he promifed to geue euery fouldier halfe a Mina, every Centener tenne Minas, and to every Colonell of a thow fand men a talent. His fonne was very angry withall: infomuch as Pompey fending for him to come to supper to him, he aunswered againe, that was not the frendshippe he looked for at Pompeys handes, for he should finde many other ROMANES that would offer him that curtesie. Pompey for his aunfwere, clapped him vp as a prisoner, and kept him to be led in triumphe at Rome. Shortly af- Tierenes ter, Phraates king of PARTHIA fent Ambassadors to Pompey to demaunde this young Prince, some a prithat was his sonne in law: and to tell him that the river of Euphrates must be the yttermost E confines of his conquestes. Pompey aunswered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his sensommer fonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would doe it with intering of his borders, that he would doe it with intering flice. So, leaving Afranius in ARMENIA to keepe the contrie, Pompey passed by other nations Pompey. which inhabite about mount Caucasus, having Mithridates in chace: of which nations, two caucasus of the chiefest and of greatest power, are the ALBANIANS and IBBRIANS. Pompey might if he had would have kept them for com ouer the river, yet did he fuffer them quietly to paffe ouer. When they were all ouer, he was against them, ouercame them in battell, and flue a great number of them in the field. After wardes he pardoned their kinge, submittinge him selfe vnto Pompey by his Ambassadors, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went against the IBERTANS: who were no life in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the first, and also better souldiers, and were resolved Pompey our. ly bent to doe good seruice vnto Mithridates, and to drive out Pompey. These I BE RIAMS Wife neuer fibiect to the Empire of the Persians, nor of the Medes, and scaped also from being fubiect to the Macedonians, for that Alexander neuer flayed in the contry of Hyacana whom also Pompey ouercame in a great & bloodie battell, hauing slaine nine thowsand indea field, and taken terme thow and prisoners. From thence he went into the contry of Course DA. There Servilus met him by the river of Phasis, with the fleete of shippes with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to followe Mithridates further, who had hidde him fellow mongest a people that were neighbours vnto the straightes of Bosphorvs, and the manifes Mæotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newes that the AL: The Albania BANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them, Thereuppon rebell against he passed againe ouer the river of Cyrnus, with great paine and daunger, bicause the batte. rous people had made a strong defence a great way alongest the river side, with a manuscular number of great trees, feld and layed a croffe one ouer an other. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty paffed thorow them, he fell into an euill fauored contry, where he flood (trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereuppon he caused ten thousand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and so went forward to meete with his enemies, when he found by the river of Abas, being fixe score thowsande sootemen, and twelve thousand horsemen, but all (or the most of them) ill armed with wilde beastes skinnes. Their Chieftaine was Cosis, the kinges owne brother. He, when the battell was begonne, flew apon? pey, and threwe a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on thother fide, rannehim through with his launce on both fides,& flue him starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battel, which fought of the barbarous peoples side, coming from the mountaines that runne alongest the river of Thermodon. For, after the overthrow guen, the ROMANES spoyling the dead, sound targets, and buskinnes of the AMAZONES, butnotal body of a woman among them. They also doe inhabite on the side of the mountaine Caucafus, that looketh towardes Mare Hyrcanium, and doe not border vpon the ALBANIANAIDE Gels and Let the GELE, and the LELEGES are between them, with whom they company two moneths only euery yeare meeting together, by the river of Thermodon, and all the rest of the year, pany with the they live a parte by them selves. After this last battell, Pompey going to invade the contribution HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venemous ferpents which he met with, being come within three days inney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the leffe, and there received preferre which were sent unto him from the kings of the E LYMIANS and the MEDES, and wrotered curreoully vnto them againe: howbeit he fent Afranius with parte of his armie against the ! king of the Parthians, who had inuaded the contry of Gordiena, and harried and fooled the king of Tigranes subjects. Notwithstanding, he draue him out, and sollowed him vno As-BELITIDE. Purthermore, all the leg mans and concubines of king Mithridates being brought vinto Pompey, he would touche none of them, but fent them all home againe, to their parents and frendes, bicause the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of noblemen, of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans, had most creat about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his castel, where the greatest pass of his treasure of gold and filter lay, was a fingers daughter, who as they fayd, was not rides but an old man. She having song one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in fancy with her, that he would needes have her lye with him the fame night, and the oldans

A slate of gold and filter, and a great company of ferting men, groomes of ghamber & pages antification had brought him maruelous riche apparell, & a horfe ready as the gates bravebeformithed, as the kings familiars did vie when they went abroade into their ity: he thought hwas done in mockery, to have made sporte with him, and therefore would have runne his had not the feruing men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that dved of late, which the king had bestowed on him, and that all this he saw, was but a little percion in respect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleving them, arthe length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got up a horse backe, & riding through the streetes, cried, all this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to forme for it, he told them: mafters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out but rather. that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so madde for iov. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we have told you. She did then deliver this castell into Pompers hands and offer redhim many goodly riche prefents: but he would take none of them, other then fligh as fermed to adorne the temples of the goddes, and to beautifie his triumphe, and left all the reft with Stratonice her felfe, to dispose as the thought good. In like manner also the king of the IMPLANS, having fent him a beditead, a table, and a chayer of cleane golde, praying him to mile it as a remembraunce from him: he delivered it over unto the Treaforers cultody, to be Pompey abo attenuntable for it vnto the state. In an other castell called Geenon, he found servaine secret leners fent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruelously to reade bicause thereby he plainly understoode the kinges nature and inclination. For in them were mencioned that he O had bowfoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne some, and Aleans the SARDHANIAN Minbridges bicause he had wonne the bell, at the horse race before him. There was also interpretinge of dreames; that either him felfe or his wives had dreamed, and also love letters between Monime and him. Theophanes wryteth alfo, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which heinnifed and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMANES to death that were in Asia. Howbeit in reason men thinke, that this was a shamefull lye, maliciously deuised by Theophami who hated Rutilius, bicause he was but a counterfeate to him : or peraduenture to gratifie Pompey, whose father Rutilius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as ever lived. Rutiliar, and Thence Pompey departed towardes the city of Amis vs. There his ambition brought him to historiogracommit fuch factes, as he him felfe did condemne before in Lucultus: for that his enemy being? Dyeraliue, he tooke voon him to establish lawes, to geue giftes, and distribute such honors, as Captaines that had obtained victory were wont to doe, when they had ended all warre and trouble. For he him felfe (Mithridates being yet the stronger in the realme of BORPHORYS. and having a great puissant army about him) did all that which he reproued an other for, appointing provinces, and geuing out giftes to every man according as he deferued to gratific twelue barbarous kinges, with divers other Princes, Lordes and Captaines, that came to him thither. Wryting also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to gene him that title, which o. thers were wont to doe in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kinges, Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great defire to winne Synta, and to goe through the contry of A RABIA, euen vnto the redde fea, bicaufe he might enlarge his conqueftes and victories every way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole earth. For in Lin va. he was the first Romans that conquered all to the great fea. On thother side, in Spayne he enlarged thEmpire of Rows, and brought the confines thereof winto Mare Atlantique. And thirdly, having lately the ALBANIANS in chafe, he came almost ynto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put him felfe in torney, intending his circuite vnto the redde fea, specially bicause he sawe Minimilates to ill to follow & worfe to ouersome by force when he fled, then when he fought, Pompeys in. any battell : and that made him fay, thathe would leave a fharper enemy behinde him, then my into Syhim felfer and that he ment; famine, For he appointed fouldiers with fufficient number of " thippes, to lye in waite for the marchauntes that failed to the contrie of Bosemony sto cary them any vittells or other marchaundifes, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should attemptit. Then he went forward with the best parte of his army, and in his way, founde the bodies of dead Romanes which Mishridates had overthrowen vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet unburied. So he caused the mall to be taken up, and honorably

About that time it chauced, that Pompey being very defirous to prefere Afranius to be Conful, he caused certaine money to be genen amongest the tribes of the peoples, & the fame was deliuered out to fome, euen in his owne gardens. This thing being report red abroad in the city every man spake ill of Pompey that he put the Consulthip to sale for me nev. vnto those that could not deserve it by vertue, fith him selfe only had obtained it by purchale, of many a noble & worthy deede. Then fayd Cato to his wife and fifter: loe now, we had p bene partakers of this fault to had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it they conferfed he had reason to refuse the match, for equity and his honor. But now to his triumphe, For

But the greatest honor that ever he wanne, and which neuer other Confull of the Romanes but him selfe obtained, was this: that he made his third triumphe of the three partes of the world. Divers other Roman Bs had Pompey conmumphed thrise before him, howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICKE : the seconde time of quered three EVROPE: the third time of Asia. So that it appeared by these three triumphes, that he had work miumphed in maner of all the lande that is inhabited, being at that time, (as it is reported by then which compare his doinges vnto Alexander the great) vnder foure and thirty yeares of Affa. age, though in troth at that time he was neere forty. And thus it fortuned Incullus at his returne out of Asia (where Pompey had vucurteously vied him) was then Incultur bevery well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to Rome. For the loud of the Senate did counsell and incorage him to deale in thaffaires of the state, feeing him waxevery O flow, and geuen too much to his ease & pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gotten. of Asia.

Sowhen Pompey was come, he beganne to speake against him, and through the frendshippe resulting and affiftance of Cato, confirmed all his doinges in A sin, which Pompey had broken and rese mored against ded. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driven to have recourse voted the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in frendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes, flance. the most impudent & vilest person was Clodius : who received him, & made him a praye vnto Pompey lay the people. For he had Pompey ever at his elbow, & against his honor caried him vp & downe and with the the market place after him, to speake as occasion served to confirme any matter or devise of the people. which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his goodwill he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he D would forfake Civero, who was his frend, and had done much for him in matters of common wealth, Pompey graunted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in daunger of law, and Pompey for requiring Pompeys frendship to helpe him, he shut his dore against them that came to speake field cierco. in his behalfe, and went out him felfe at an other backe dore. Cicero thereuppon fearing thext treamity of law, willingly for fooke Rome. At that time, Iulius Cafar returning home from his Prztorshippe out of SPAYNE, beganne to lay such a platte, that presently brought him into great fauor, and afterwardes much increased his power, but otherwise viterly undid Pompet and the common wealth. Now he was to fue for his first Consultshippe, and considering the enmitte betwext Pompey and Crassus, if he joyned with the one, he made thother his enemies he deuised to make them frendes, a thing seeming of great honestic at the first sight, but yet a cafar recon-E pestilent deuise, and as subtill a practise as could be . For the power of the city being before ciled Pompes deuided into two partes, (as a shippe evenly ballest of eche side) and maintained the common wealth vpright: being now brought into one mas power, there was no possibility to withstand it, fothat all fell to wracke in the end. Whereuppon, Cato wifely told them afterwardes, that fayd the civill warres between Pompey and Cafar was cause of the destruction of the common wealth: that their enmity and discord was not the chiefe originall cause of this misery, but rather their frendshippe and agreement. For by their frendshippe, Cefar was chosen Consull, who straight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for restoring of the colonies belonging to Rome, and for distributing of lands to them that had none simbaling the caffer law for maiesty and dignity of the chiefe Magistrate, and making the Consultation maner no bet-desident of F ter then he Tribunelhip of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellowe Confull, did what he lander Lex could to refift him, and Cato also did aide him to his power ; vntill Casar openly brought Pomper into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if frends, to trye what credit he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common affembly to here how a matter of his was handled: this Clodius having a company of vacabondes and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did : he fitting in a place E where he might be seene from the rest, beganne to aske these questions out alowde. Who is the licentiousest Captaine in all this city? What man is he that seekes for a man? What is he that scratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a companie of daunsers or singers, when he spake and clapped his handes on his gowne, aunswered him straight alowde to energueftion, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys harte, that was not wont to heare him felfe fo ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any such kinde of fight: but yet it made him byte the lippe more, when he faw the Senate glad to fee him thus shamed and reproued, asa fust revenge & punishment for his vile betraying and forfaking of Cicero. So, great sturre and vprore being made upon this in the market place, and many men fore hurt, and one of Clodim bondmen being taken also in the prease of the people with a sword in his hand, very necreva-F to Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwife fearing Clodius infolency & prowde words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept # them that threaten with the fword, I will bring both fword and target. Pompey in all his life ne. uer did nor spake thinge that men more misliked, then that which he sayd at that time. His frendes excused him, and fayd it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware : but his deedes afterwardes shewed, that he was altogether at Cafars commaundement. For not many daves after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cafar, which was affianced, or made fure he fore, vnto Seruilius Capso when no man thought of it and to pacific Capsoes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whome he had also promised before vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla: and Cefar also maried Calpharnia, the daughter of Pifo. After this, Pompey filling all Roma with fouldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Confull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they fodainly fet vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him : and some one, whatsoeuer he was, cast a basket of horse dong apon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very fore hurt. By this meanes, having cleered the market place of all their enemies, they paffed the law for division of lands, as they would them selves. The people being fleshed with this baite, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would never flicke arange matter that they would have passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lacolles was against: and they appointed vnto Cafar also, the government of the GAVLES on this side and beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for five yeres space, with four ewhole legions. The new o yeare following were appointed Confulls, Pifo Cafars father in law, and Gabinius the greats flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things stoode in these tearmes, Bibulus though he were Confull, kept him felfe close in his house for eight monethes space, and only sent out

At that time it was that Pompey fayd: it was more vnseasonable for an old man to followe his pleasure, then to attend matters of the comon wealth. Yet him felfe shortly after was so doted of his young wife. that he would follow her vp and downe in the contry, and in his gardens, and leaue all affaires p of waight aside. Whereupon Clodins being then Tribune of the people, despised Pompey, and beganne to enter into seditious attemptes. For when he had driven Cicero out of Rome, and had fent away Cato to make warres in CYPRV s, and that Cafar also was occupied in GAVLE & finding that the people in like case were at his commaundement, bicause to flatter them be did what they would have him: he attempted incontinently to vido fome things that Pomer had established. Amongest other things, he tooke Tigranes out of prison, and ever caried him vp and downe with him wherefoeuer he went, and continually pict quarrells vnto Pompers home still, consulting with his frendes what way he shouldtake, to appeale the anger of the Senate against him. Thereuppon, one of his frendes called Culeo pertwaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and veterly to refuse Cafars frendshippe, and to sticke again to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithstanding he was contented to hearken was them that gaue him counsell to call Cicero home againe, who was Cloding mortall enemie, and in great fauor. with the Senate. Thereuppon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the marker place _ to moun the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and divers were flaine of either fide: notwith flanding, he overcame Cloding. Thus Gicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey agains in fauor with the Senate, and standing with the lawe propounded to geue Pompey authoritie to cause R come to be brought to Rome, he once againe made him have power both by land and fea onerall the territories of the ROMANES. For all the hauens, martes & fayres, & all store houses for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandife and tillage, came ynder Pompeys hands.

Then Clodius accusing him, fayd: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of vit- commission rells, but that they made a dearth of vittells, bicaufe the lawe should passe, to revive Poissons gent to Pois power and authority againe, that was almost vnder foote. This packet being bewrayed and spred abroad through Rome, the honestest force misliked much thereof Wherupon Marsellinus at an open affembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would fue for the Confulship at the next election. So, they being viged by the people to make aunfwere, Pompey spake first, and said: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Crassus aunfwered more gently, that he would doe that which should be best for the common wealth Then Marcellinus tharpely inveying against Pompey, he angrily againe cast him in the teeth. faid, that Marcellinus was the ranckeft churle, and the vnthankefulleft beaft in the world: face that of a dumme man he had made him eloquent, and being in maner starued and famished many a time he had filled his bellie. This notwithstanding, divers that before were determined to fue for the Confulthip, went no further in it, fauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cate coun. felled and incoraged not to geue it ouer: for, faid he, thou doeft not contend for the Confulthip but to defend the common libertie of thy contry against two tyrannes. Pompey therefore feating Casoes faction, leaft that having all the Senates good willes, he should drawe also the market place. To this ende therefore, he fent men armed against him, who at the first onser of pompo ob- flue the torche bearer that caryed the torche before him, and made all the reft flie; among eff sayning the fecond Conwhom also Cato was the last man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domi-C tius. Pompey and Crassius being become Consuls after this sorte, they ordered them selues no. thing the more temperately nor honeftly. For first of all, the people being about to choose Cato Prætor, Pompey being at thaffembly of the election, perceyuing that they would choose him, brake vp the affembly, falfely alleaging that he had noted certaine ill fignes, and afterwardes, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they chose Ania

and Vatinius Prætors. After that, by Trebonius tribune of the people, they published edicts. authorifing Cufars charge for fine yeares lenger, according to the appointment they had Prosinces de- made with Cafar. Vinto Crassin also they had appointed SYRIA, and the warre against the PAR-THIANS. VIItO Pompey in like case, all AFRICKE, and both SPAYNES, with foure Legions besides: of the which, at Cafars desire, helent him two legions to help him in his warre in GAVLE. D These thinges done, Crassus departed to his Province, at the going out of his Consulthin and Pompey remayned at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly playes to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for learning and musicke, and caused wilde beaftes also to be baited and hunted, and killed a fine hundred lions . But of all thinges, there was no fuch fearefull fight and terrible fight, as was between the elephantes. This great charge and bowntifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to shew the people pastime and pleasure made him againe to be very much efteemed of, and beloued amongest the people. Buton thother fide, he wanne him felfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernment of his Prouinces and Legions into the handes of his Lieutenants, whileft he him felfe romed up and downe the pleafaunt places of ITALY, with his wife at his pleafure: either bycausehews H farre in loue with her, or els for that the loued him to dearely, that he could not finde in his harte to leave her companie. It was reported of her, (being knowen of many) that this young lady Iulia loued her housband more dearely, not for Pompeys florishing age, but for his affured continencie, knowing no other woman but her: besides also, he was no solemne man, but pleafaunt of conuerfation, which made women loue him maruelously, vnles we will reprote the curtifan Floraes false testimonie. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, mentiling fodainely in hurly burly, drew their fwordes, and many were flaine about Pompey: infomuch as his clothes being bloudyed, he fent his men home in hafte to fetche him other to change him. His young wife that was great with child, feeing his clothes bloudie, tooke fuch a flight in spon it, that she fell downe in a sownde before them, and they had much a doe to recour F her, and yet the fell straight in labor aponit, and was deliuered. So that they themselues, which blamed him most for his good will he bare vnto Cafar: could not reproue the love he bare

But ftraight when this alliace was broken, which rather covered, then bridled their ambitious defire to rule: there rose a new sturre in Rose summediatly, and every mans month was full of nritile prattle and feditious wordes. Nor longe after that also came newes, that Graffee was The begitmerthrowen, and flaine in PART HIA: who was a manifest staye and let to kepe them two from different by mo. But Pompey ipake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and alfo left it fooner then they thought he would have done: & that he witnessed by discharging his aimie so soone. Then thinking that Casar would not discharge his armie; he fought to make him felfe strong against him, by procuring offices of the cine, without any other alteracion. Neither would be feeme to miftruit him, but he plainely shewed that he did despise and contemne him. But when he sawe that he could not obtaine the offices of the citie as he would, bicause the citizens that made the elections were bribed with money:he then left it without a magistrate, so that there was mone either to commaund; D orthat the people (hould obey. Hereupon there ranne a brute straight, that there must nedes be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius tribune of the people, who perswaded them to choose Pomper, Bur Gatostucke so stowely against it that the Tribune had like to have loft his office, even in the market place. But then many of Pompers frendes stepped vp, and excused him, saying that he neither sought, nor would have the Dictatorship.

Then Cate commended him much, and praying him to fee good order kept in the common wealth: Pompey being ashamed to denie to reasonable a request, was careful of it. Thereupon two Confuls were chosen, Domitim; and Messala: but afterwardes when the state beganne to chaunge againe, by the death of one of the Confuls, and that divers were more earnessly bent to haue a Dict ator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with furie determined E to geue Pompey fome office of reasonable authoritie, to kepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Informuch, Bibulus him felfe being chiefe of the Senate, and Pompeys ennemie, was the Variance as first that moved . Pompey might be chosen Constill alone : for, faid he, by this measures, either mong the sethe common wealth shalbe ridde of the present trouble, or els it shalbe in Bondage to an ho melt man. This opinion was maruelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whiereupon, Caro flading vp. it was thought straight he would have spoken against him. But silence being made cato stake in him, he plainely tolde them, that for his owne parto he would not have bene the first man to Pompos fa-

Then Pomper made very freedly countenance vito Cate, and thanked him for the home he had done him, praying him privately to affift him with his counfell in the Confulting Cato aunswered him, that there was no cause why he should thanke him, for he had spole nothing for his fake, but for respect of the common wealth only; and for his counsellating

Her father also, was a noble man, both in bloud, and life. Notwish standing, these valike mariages did nothing please somes for Cornelia was young enough to haue bene his sonnes wife. Now the best cirizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the common wealth, being in such a trouble some time, which had chosen him only as her remedie to redreffe the same and that he in the meane time gaue him selfe ouer to me rying and feafting, where rather he should have bene carefull of his Consulthippe, which was disposed apon him against the lawe, for common calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had bene quiet, Furthermore, he harpely proceeded against them, which be briberie and vnlaufull meanes came to office: and having made lawes and ordinaunces for the administration of Iustice otherwise, he delt iustly and verightly in all thinges, gening faleig order, filence and grauitie, to matters of Judgement, with force of armes, himselfe being pin fent: fauing that when his father in lawe was also accused among other, he fent for the three hundred & three score Judges home to his home, praying them to helpe him. Whereppon when the accuser saw Scipio accompanied by the Ludges them selues, retorning into the man ket place : he let fall his fute. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he having made a lawe, that no man should praise the offendors, whilest their matter was a hearing: came him felfe and openly praifed Planens being accused. There upon Cate being one of the Indges, stopped his cares with both his handes, saying: thathell might not heare an offendor praised, seeing it was forbidden by lawe. But therefore he was refused for a Judge, before they gaues entence. Notwithstanding, Planeus was condemned by all the rest of the ludges, to Pompeys great shame and reproache. Shortly after Hapfew, one that had bene Conful, being likewife accused, watching Rompey on a time as he came out of his bathe to goe to supper vpon his knees he befoughe Pompeys fauor and helpe. Cefar, frend seing oareyeares that, stepped vp for him, and prayed that there might also be had some consideracion of him, farther. that had likewise great warres for the Empire of Rome: faying that his good service deserved, either that they should make him Consul againe, or els that they should prolonge his charge and government, so as he might yet peacibly enjoye the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to thend that no other successor might reape the frute of his labor. Much sturre and contention being about this matter at Rome, Pompey as though for goodwill he ment to excuse the enuie they might have borne Cafar, said that he had receyved lettres from him, by the which he requested a successor, and to be discharged of this warre: and furthers more, that he thought it good they should graunt him priviledge to demaund the second Consulhippe, although he were absent. Cicero him felfe alfo, though he had both written and geuen counsell to the contrarie, thought it a shame to him not to beamongest the nomber of them that would hazard their lives for defence of their contry. There came vnto him also Tidius Sextius even into MACEDON, notwithstanding that he was another man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pampey faw him, he rose & went to meete him, judging it 2 good token of their goodwills vinon him, when such olde men as he, chose rather to be with him in daunger, then at home with fafety. Hereupon they fate in counfell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they hould put no citizen of Rome to death but in battel, and should facke no citie that was subject to the Empire of Rome: the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing doe with the warres, either bycause they dwelt farre of, or els for that they were so poore, as otherwise they were not regarded: did yet both in deede and word fauor Pompeys parte, thinking him an enemie both to the goddes and men, that wished not Pompey victorie. Cafar also The clemency shewed him selfe very mercifull & curteous, where he ouercame. For when he had wonneall Pompeys armie that was in Spayne, he fuffred the captaines that were taken to go at liberie. & onely referred the fouldiers. Then comming over the ALPES againe, he paffed throughall out of Spane, IT ALY, & came to the citie of BRYNDVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there paffing ouer the fea, he went vnto the citie of O RIC V M, & laded there, Now Cafar having Vibius, one of Pompey famillier frends with him, whom he had take prisoner: he sent him vnto Pompey to pray agains that they might meete, & both of them desperse their armies within three dayes, and being recociled (geuing their faith one to an other) fo to retorne into I TALY like good frends together Pompey thought againe, that these were new deutifes to intrappe him. Thereupon he sodainely wet downe to the fea, & tooke all the places of streeth by the sea side, saffy to lodge his campe in, & all the ports, creekes & harbars for thips to lie in rode: fo that what wind fo euer blewon the skie, it served his turne, to bring him either men, vittells, or money. Cafar on thother side was so distressed both by sea & by land, that he was drive to procuer battel, & to affaile Pompey ! euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom most times he euer had the better in all skirmishes, sauing once, when he was in daunger to haue lost all his army.

A Bot Pompey had valiantly repulled his men, and made them flie, and had flaine two thowsand Pompey our of them in the field : but he durft not enter pel mel with them into their campe as they field for. Whereupon Cufar faide to his frendes, that his enemie had wonne the victorie that day, if he had known how to ouercome. B fortific and intrench them selves, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hande, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his mobito bequiet, and not to fturre, perceyuing that after this last bickering Cafar being scanted with vitells raifed his campe, and departed thence to goe into Thessaly, through the contrie of the ATHAMANIANS then he could no more bridle their glorie and corage, which eried 1000 firis fled, let vs follow him. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Gafar, losely Cafa being determined not to geue him battell, but to befeege him, & only to compaffe him into Theffat, being neere vnto him, and so to cut him of from vittells. There was also an other reasonthat made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech genen our among the Romans knights that so some as ever they had overcome Cafar, they

For said he, these hraue fellowes and fine daunsers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cefers deuife at that time. Pompey being a horse backe, rode vp and downe to consider the ordinaunce of both battells: and perceyuing that his enemies stoode still in their ranckes, looking for the figuall of battell, & that his owne battell on thother fide waved up & downe diforderly, as men vnskilfull in warres: he was affrayed they would flie before they were charged.

Therupo he straightly comanded the in the voward, that they should stedily kepe their racks, Pompeis or R and standing close together should so defend them selves, receyuing the charge of the enemy. dimener of his But Cafar difliked of that deuile, for thereby, faid he, the force of their blowes was lestened & Cafar milliin withholding them fro geuing the charge, he not only tooke away that courage which that- keth Pompete faitant carrieth with him that commeth with furie: but made them more over fainte hearted. ordinance. in recevuing the charge of the enemies. In Cafars armie, there were about two and twentie Basell bethowfand fighting men: and in Pompeys armie, fomewhat about twife as many. Now , when ment cafer

But a few of the chiefest of the ROMANES, and cerraine GRECIAN's that were there also out of the set battel, perceyuing the imminent daunger, beganne to bethinke them, to what paffe the ambition and wilfull contencion between thefe C two men, had brought the state of Rome. For, the weapons of kinsmen, the bandes of brethem the enseignes all alike, the flower of so many valliant men of one citie, did serue for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prickt forward with couctousnes; is quite blinde and without reason. For if they could have bene contented quietly to have governed that which they had conquered: the greatest, and best part of the world, both by sea and by land, was sub-

ne & triumphe, they had occasion of warre enough offred them against the PARTHIANS and Germanes. Furthermore, they had enough to do besides to conquer Scythia, and the In-DIANS: & withal, they had had an honest culler to have cloked their ambirious delires, if it had benebut to have brought the barbarous people to a civil life. For what horsemen of Sc x-D THIA, OF ARTOWES OF PARTHIA, OFFICHES OF INDIANS, could have abidden the power of three fore & ten thow fand ROMANE fouldiers, & specially being led by two so famous captaines, as Pompey, and Cafar? whose names, these straunge & farre nations vnderstood, longe before the name of the ROMANE s: fo great were their victories, having conquered fo many wilde, & barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one against the other, not regarding their honor, which made them so ambitious: did not spare their owne contry, who had vntill that time remained vnumeible, both in fame and prowes. For, the alliance that was made between them, the love of Iulia. & marving with her, was suspected fro the beginning to be but a deceit, &a pledge as it were of a cospiracie made betwene the for a private benefit, more the for any true frendship. Now, who the feildes of PHARSALIA were conered ouer with men, with horse

E and armor, and that the fignall of battell was geuen on either fide the first man of Cafats army that advanced forward to gene charge, was Caim Crassinius, captaine of fix score and fine Caim Crassimen, to performe a great promise which he had made vnto Cafar. For Cafar, when he came the onles of out of his tent in the morning, seeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what cafee side. hethought of the flic ceffe of this battell a Crashinia holding our his right hand vnto him, coragyoully cryed: Oh Cafar, thing is the victorie, and this daye thou shalt commend me cither aline or dead. Then remembring these wordes, he brake out of the ranckes, and many following after him, ranne amongefulthe middeft of his enemies. Straight they came to the fword, and made great flaughter. But he preffing forward still, one with a thrust ranne him through the mouth, that the fwords pointe came through at his necke. maundement, and hyt the younge gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfall to fight. & least of all looking for such maner of fight had not the hartes to defend themselves

nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heades, & clapping their hades on their faces, thamefully fled. They being ouerthrowen, Cafars men made no accomme to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battel of footemen, in that place special ly where they had no gard of horsemen, whereby they might the easelier be compassed about Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the voward also by the tenth legion perceyuing them selues (contrarie to their expectation) compassed about by their enemies where they thought to have environmed them: they could make no longer refiftance. They also being likewise driven to flie, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, & coniectured the flying of his horsemen: what minde he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his counterance a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wittes end, forgetting thather fields of Phar was Pompey the great: for that he went firaight into his campe, and spake neuer a word to an man, rightly verifiying Homers verses to this effect.

For Afinisas Pollio writeth (who was arthat battell on Calor reparted this fide) that there were flaine onely but fix thowfand fouldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe. Cafars fouldiers then found plainly the madnes Sevanitie of Pompeys men. For, all their I tentes and paulions were full of no legaves and garlandes of mirtle, & their couches all couch red with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, and men prepared ready to do facrifice for iove rather then to arme them selues to fight. Thus went they to battell caried away with this

having a very few with him: & perceying that no man purfied him, he went a foote faire &

Thus when he was passed the citie of Larissa, and comming withe vallie of Tempe: there being The milerable a thirly, he fell downe of his bellie, and dranke of the river. Then riving vp againe, he went his flate of Pom- way thence, and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the daye, he went into a little bote vpon the riner, and tooke the free men with him that were about him, and as for the flaues, he fent them backe against and did counsell them boldely to goe to Cafar; and not to be affrayed. Thus rowing up and downe the shore side, in this little bote, he spyed a great shippe of burden in the maine sea, we ! ding at anker, which was ready to waye anker, and to faile awaye. The mafter of the thippe was a Romane, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pomper, yet knew him

Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVs in a gally of SE. E LEVCIA with his wife Cornelia. The refidue of his traine imbarked also, some into gallies, &cothers into marchauntes shippes of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without daunger, Pompey arri- When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolomy was in the citie of PELVSIVM with his armie, making warre against his sister: he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arrivall, and to intreate him to receive him. King Ptolomy was then but young man, infomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He affenn bled a counfell of the chiefest and wifest men of the court, who had such credit and authoritie as it pleased him to geue them. It was a miserable thinge to see Pothinus, an eunuche of the kinges, and Theodotus of F CHIO, an hyered schoolemaster to teache the young king rethoricke, and Achilles EGYPT TIAN to confult among them selues what they should doe with Pompey the great. These were to it. For Pompey at the length might have asked him, what providence of the gods there had a a mechiefest counsellers of all his eunuches, and of those that had brought him up, Nowe did bene in his doings ? And Cratippus might have aunswered him, that for the ill government the common wealth at Rome, it was of necessity that it should fall into the handes of a form raine Prince. Peraduenture Crationus might then haue asked him: how, and whereby Pomes wouldest thou make vs beleue, if thou haddest ouercome Casar, that thou wouldest haueviel thy good fortune better then he? But for divine matters, referre them to the goddes as it pleafeth them. Pompey taking his wife and frends with him, hoifed faile, and landed no where, her will blame them for refuting of him, and Cafar for not keeping of him. Therefore, this thould diers also, insomuch he had a three score Senators of Rome againe in his company. Then, you derstanding that his army by sea was yet whole, and that Cate had gathered together a great number of his fouldiers after the ouerthrowe, whome he had transported with him into A. Phebidas, not secretly but openly bicause he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the ROMANES, either through ignorance, or to pleafure his frends: the fame did Agesilaus vnto the LACEDEMONIANS, through anger & felfe will in renuing warre with the Bos of IANS, apon a full peace concluded. If we shall reckon of the

He did not as Pompey, who made him felfe great to the benefit of the common wealth, and for the common wealthes fake, did forfake fuch honor and so great authoritie, as neuer Captaine before him, but Alexander the great, had the like in those partes. But now to other matter. Touching their battells and exploytes in warres, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xen. phon him selfe if he were alive, could not compare Agefilans victories vnto his: although for the fingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompense thereof he had liberie graunted him, to wryte and speake of Agestlans what he thought good. Me thinkes also, there was great difference betwext Pompey and Agefilane, in their equitie and clemencie towards their enemies. For, whilest Agesilans went about to conquer THEBES, and vtterly torace and destroy the citie of MESSINA, the one being an auncient citie of his contrie, and theo-Agestiam lost ther the capitall citie of BOBOTIA: he had almost lost his owne citie of SPARTA, for at the least he lost the commaundement and rule he had over the rest of GRECE. The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pirates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and ma. ner of life: and when it was in his choyle to lead Tigranes king of A min ministen triumphen ROME, he chose rather to make him a confederat of the ROMANES, faying, that he preferred perpetuall honor before one dayes glorie. But fince it is reason we should geue the first place and honor of the discipline of warres, vitto a Captaine of the greatest skill and experience warres: the LACED EMONIAN then leaueth the ROMANE farre behind. For first of all Agettin neuer for fooke his citic, though it was befreged with three fcore and ten thow fand men, and 0

ouerthrowen at the battell of Levetres. And Pompey on thother fide, hearinge that with fine thowfand footemen onely had taken a towne in Iralia: fled from Rome in vert feare. And therein he can not be excused of one of these two: either that he sled cowards for so few men, or else that he had a false imagination of more. For he conceved his wife and children away, but he left all the reft without defence, and fled: where in deede he shoulded ther haue ouercome, valliantly fighting for defense of his contrie, or else haue received the condicions of peace which the conquerors should have offered him. For, he was a citizen and allied vitto him. For he that thought it an vittollerable thing to prolong the tearme of his gouernment, or to graunt him a second Consulthippe: did now geue him oportunitie, suffe D ring him to take the city of Rome, to fay vnto Metellus the Tribune, & the rest, that they were all his prisoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth him felfe the stronger, and also to keepe him selfe from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker: Agestlans excelling in that, did euer keepehim selse inuincible. Casar also had great skill therein, to keepe him selse from daunger beingste weaker, and againe could tell howe to compell Fompey to hazard battell, to his viter definiction by lande, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made him felfe Lordeof the treasure, vittells, and also of the sea, which his enemies had in their handes, without fighting. That which they alleage in his excuse, is that which most doth condemne him, specially for fo great and skillfull a Captaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young General of E an armie may easily be brought from his wife and safe counsell, with rumor and tumult of a few fearefull men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonor for him if he did otherwise: yetwere this no straunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompeythe great, whose campe the Romanes called their contrie, and his tent the Senate, and called all the Prætors and Confuls that gouerned at Rome, rebells and traitors to the common wealth of Rome: who could excuse him (who was never seene commanded by other then him felfe, but had bene alwayes chiefe Captaine and Generall in any warre he made, and ever had the vpper hand) but that he was drawen on by the scoffes of Faonius, and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endaunger the whole Empire and liberty of Rome, only for feare they should call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had so much regarded present infamie, he should have F fought from the beginning for defence of the citie of Rome, and not to have taken example of Themistocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a shame as he did, to lye in THES-

A CALLE 2 time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fieldes of Pharfalia for a Theater, or close campe, of necessitie to fight which of them shoulde haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Heraulde to fummone him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must aunswere to his name, and come and fight, or else to loose the honor of the crowne vnto an other. But there were infinite other fieldes and townes (and as a man woulde say the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by sea gaue him choyse to conquer if he would rather have followed the steppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucultus, or of Agesilaus him selfe: who did paciently abide no lesse tumultes within the citie felfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to fummone him to come out to fight, for all the rest of his contrie. And in ÆGYPT also, he did abide many false accusations against him.

B wherewith the king him felfe did burden him, praying him alwayes to have a litle pacience. In fine , having followed the best counsell which he had determined with him selfe from the Agestiana beginning, he faued the AGYPTIANS against their willes: and furthermore, he did not only than Pompty. keepe the citie of Spanta from fo great a daunger, but did also fet up tokens of triumphe in the same against the Thebans, whereby, he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the flaughter, and besides that, gaue his citizens occasion to obtaine victorie afterwardes. Hereupon Agesilaus was highly praised of them, whose lines he had saued against their wills. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by them felues, through whom he had offended yet fome fay, that he was deceived by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the most parte of the money to him felfe which he had brought out of Asia, did haften and perswade Pom-

C per to geue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true. a worthie Captaine should not so lightly have bene brought into error, vpon a false accompt, to hazard him felfe to loofe all. Thus may we fee what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore for their iorneys into ÆG YPT, the one fled thither by Pompeys force: the other willingly went thither with small honor, for moneys sake to serue the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the GRECIANS. Lastly, in that which we accuse the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompeys sake: for the like matter doe they againe accuse Agesilaus. For the one was cruelly put to death & betrayed by them whom

Auing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander & A of Iulius Cafar, that ouercame Pompey having to speake of many things I will vie none other preface, but only defire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare al things at large, but briefly touch divers. chiefly in those their noblest acts & most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intent is not to write histories, but only lines. For, the noblest deedes doe not alwayes shew mens vertues and vices, but oftetimes a light occasion, a word, or some sporte makes mens naturall dispositions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battells wonne, wherein are flaine tenne thowfande men, or the great armies, or cities wonne by fiege or affault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no accompt of o-B ther partes of the bodie, do take the resemblaunces of the face and fauor of the countenance. in the which confifteth the judgement of their maners & disposition: euen so they must gene vs leaue to seeke out the signes and tokens of the minde only, and thereby shewe the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to wryte the warres, battells, and other great thinges they did. It is certaine that Alexander was discended from Hercules by Caranus, and that of his mothers side, he came of the blood of the AEacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, thatking Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time also was a younge maiden, and an orphane without father or mother, in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both received into the misterie and fraternity of the house of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with C whose consent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about into divers slames. King Philip her husband also, shortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did feale his wives belly, and that the feale wherewith he fealed, left behinde the printe of a Lyon. Certaine wifards and foothfayers, tolde Philip that this dreame gaue him warning to looke straightly to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN aunswered againe, that it signified his wife was conceived with childe, for that they doe not seale a vesfell that hath nothinge in it: and that the was with childe with a boy, which thoulde have a

Whereupon Philip after this dreame, fent Chero M'EG ALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquier what it fignified. Shortly after that king Philip had wonne the city of Potio Enthree messengers came to him the same day that brought him great newes. The first, that Parmenio had wonne a notable battell of the ILLYRIA ANS: the fecond, that his horse only wan the bell & price at the Olympian games: & the third. that his wife had brought him a fonne called Alexander, Philip being maruelous glad to heare

Now for his stature & perfo- Mexanders nage, the statues and images made of him by Lysippus doe best declare it, for that he would be stance and E drawen of no man but him only. Divers of his fuccessors & frends did afterwards counterfeat his image, but that excellent workeman Lysppus only, of all other the chiefest, hath perfectly drawen and refembled Alexanders maner of holding his needer formwhat hanging downe towards the left fide, & also the swete looke & east of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not shew his fresh colour, but made him somewhat blacke and swarter, then his face in deede was: for naturally he had a very fayre white colour, mingled also with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breft. I remember I red also in the comentaries of Aristoxenus, that his skin had a maruelous good fauor, & that his breath was very swete, insomuch that his body had so swete a smell of it selfe, that all the apparell he Alexanders wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a paffing delightfull fauor, as if it had bene perfumed. body had a

also it appeareth, that the drie & hot contries pearched with heate of the sunne, are thosether deliuer vnto vs the best spices; bicause that the sunne drieth vp the moysture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption, This natural heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appear reth) to be given to drinke, & to be hafty. Even from his childhood they faw that he was given to be chast. For though otherwise he was very hot & hasty, yet was he hardly moved with his or pleasure of the body, & would moderately vse it. But on thother side, the ambition & desire he had of honor, hewed a certaine greatnes of minde & noble corage, passing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) defirous of all kind of glory: who like a Rethoritian had a delire to vtter his eloquence, & stamped in his coynes, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games by the swift running of his horse & coches. For when he was asked one day (bicaule be was fwift of foote) whether he would affay to run for victory at the Olympian games: I could be content, said he, so I might run with kings. And yet to speake generally, he misliked all such contention for games. For it seemeth that he vtterly misliked all wrestling & other exercises prife, where men did vie all their strength: but otherwise he him self made certen festival daies & games of prife, for common stage plaiers, musitians, & singers, & for the very Poets also He delighted also in hunting of divers kindes of bealtes, and playing at the staffe. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken some famous city, or had won some great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would sayto his playfellowes: firs, my father will have all, I shall have nothing left me to conquer with you. that shalbe ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but only in valliant nes & honor, thought, that the greater conquests & realmes his father should leave him the leffe he should have to do for himselfe. And therfore, seing that his fathers dominions & Empire increased dayly more and more, perceiuing all occasion taken from him to do any great attempt the defired no riches nor pleafure, but warres & battells, & afpired to a figury where h he might win honor. He had divers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him vp:as schoolemasters, gouernors, & groomes of his chamber to attend vpon him:and among those, Leonidas was the chiefest man that had the gouernment & charge of him, a man of a seuere disposition, & a kinseman also vnto the Queene Olympias. He milliked to be called a mafter or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wher upo the others called him Alexanders gouernor, bicause he was a noble man, & allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his schoolemaster, was Lysimachus, an Acar nantan borne, who had no other maner of civility in him, fauing that he called him felfe Phanix, Alexander Achilles, & Philip Peleus: & therfore he was well thought of and was the seconde person next voto Leonidas. At what time Philonica THESSALIAN had brought Bucephal the horse to sell vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talents, E they went into the field to ryde him. The horse was found so rough & churlish that the ryders faid he would neuer do feruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voyces about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon, Philipheing affrayed, commaunded them to cary him away as a wild beaft, & altogether vnprofitable the which they had done, had not Alexander that stoode by faid, O gods, what a horse do they turne away, for lacke of skil & hart to handle him. Philip heard what he faid, but held his peace. Alexander of trepeating his wordes, seeming to be fory that they should send backe the borse againe:why, faid Philip, doest thou control them that have more experience than thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horse? Alexander answered, & yet me thinkes I should hadle him better tha all they have done. But if thou canst not no more the they replied Philip: F what wilt thou forfet for thy folly? I am cotent (9 Alexander) to icopard the price of the horle. huery man laughed to heare his aunswere: and the wager was layed betwene them. Then ran ger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without firiking or flurring the horse, made him contains the to be gentle enough. Then when he sawe that the furie of the horse was past, and that he be- berfer ganne to galloppe, he put him to his full career, and layed on spurres and voyce a good. Philip atthefirst with feare beholding his sonnes agility, least he should take some hurt, said never a word: but when he faw him redily turne the horse at the end of his career, in a brauery for that R he had done, all the lookers on gaue a showte for joy. The father on thother side (as they fay) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horse, he sayd vnto him kisfing his head: O fonne, thou must needes have a realme that is meete for thee, for MACED ON Philip pro-will not hold thee. Furthermore, considering that of nature he was not to be won by extreating former mity, & that by gentle meanes and perswasion he could make him do what he would he euer Mexander, fought rather to perswade then comaund him in any thing he had to do. Now Philip putting nogreat affiace in his schoolemasters of musicke & humanity, for the instruction & education of his sonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of

Alexander being passed into Asia, & hearing that Aristotle had put out certen bookes of that matter: for the honors fake of philosophy, he wrote a letter vnto him, somwhat too plaine, & of this effect. Alexander, vnto Aristotle greeting. Thou hast not done well to put in Epifile of forth the Acroamatical sciences. For wherin shal we excell other, if those things which thou Atrander

In the meane time, Demaratus CORINTHIAN, a frend of king Philippes, and very familliar with him, came to fee him. Philip when he had curteoufly welcommed him, asked him howethe GR ECIANS did agree together. Truely, O king, quod he, it importes you much to inquier of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is so full of quarrell & contencion, These words nipped Philip in such sorte, & caused him to know his fault, that through Demeratus meanes, whom he fent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come F. backe againe. Now whe Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (defiring for necessities fake, to enterin Aridam king league and frendship with Philip) offred his eldest daughter in mariage vnto Aridams king Phi-Philipper ba- lips sonne, & had sent Aristocritus Ambassador into Macedon for that purpose: the frends of Alexander & his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports and suspicions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduaunce Arideus to his vtter vndoing, and leave him his heire in the kingdom. Alexander being nettled therwith sent one Thessau a plaier of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus: to perswade him to leaue Arideus, that was a bastard & a foole, & rather to make alliace with Alexander. This offer pleased Pexodorus far better, to have Alexander his fonne in law, than Arideus. Philip vnderstanding this, went himself into Alexanders châber, taking Philotas with him (the sonne of Parmenio) one of his familliars, & bitterly tooke vp Ale-F xander, telling him that he had a base mind, & was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would cast himselfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a slaue & subject

And furthermore, he banished out of MACED ON, Harpalus, Nearthus, Phrygius, & Ptolomy, his fonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, & placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, Paulanias susteining villany by the counsell and commaundement of Attalus & Cleopatra, crauing Iustice of Philip, and finding no amends: Philip kine he converted all his anger against him, and for spight slue him him selfe. Of this murther, most of Macedon, men accused Quene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this young man, having just cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspition of this murther, For some say, that Pausanias after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abused: who recited these verses to him of Euripides, in the tragedie of R Medea, where the faid in anger, that the would be reuenged:

And of the father in lavve. Norwithstanding, afterwardes he caused diligent searche to be made, and all them to be feuerely punished that were of the conspiracie: and was angrie also that his mother Olympias had cruelly flaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and The beginfound his realme greatly enuyed & hated of daungerous enemies, and euery way full of daun- ning of Aleger. For, the barbarous nations that were neere neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide anders ratthe bondage of straungers, but defired to have their naturall kinges. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GR &CE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but having Calide altered the gouernmentes, had through his infolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell a for that they had not long bene aquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders counsell of MACEDON, being affraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexader should veterly for fake the affaires of GR ACE, and not to follow them with extremitie, but that he should seeke to winne the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedy these new sturres. But he farre otherwise determined to stablish his fafery by corage and magnanimitie: perfivading him felfe, that if they faw him flowpe and yeeld at the beginning, how litle fo euer it were, euery one would be apon him. Thereupon, hestraight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them sodainely with hisarmie, by the river of DANVBY, where in a great battell he overthrew Syrmus, king of the Alexander as D TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, having intelligence that the THEBANS were revolted, and that nercome Syr the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he the Tribal.

marched with his armie towardes the streight of Thermopiles, saying that he would make De- lians. molthenes the Orator fee (who in his oratios, whileit he was in ILLYRIA, & in the contry of the TRIBALLIAMS, called him child) that he was growen a stripling passing through THESSALY, Ethould finde him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to gene them of the citie occasion to repent them: and therefore onely demaunded Phanix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trompet, pardon and fafetie vnto all them that would yeld vnto him. The THE-BANS on thother fide, demaunded of him Philotas, & Antipater, two of his chiefest servauntes. E & made the crier proclaime in the citie, that all fuch as would defend the libertie of GRECE, should iowne with them. Then did Alexander leave the MACEDONIANS at libertie to make warre with all crueltie. Then the Thebans fought with greater corage and defire then they were able, confidering that their enemies were many against one. And on thother side also, when the garrison of the MACEDONIANS which were within the castell of CADMIA, made a falie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironned of all sides, were slaine in maner enery one of them, their citie taken, destroyed, & rased even to the Theber work hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GRECE afraid by ex- and rased by ample of this great calamitie and miserie of the Thebans, to thend none of them should dare Alexander. from thenceforth once to rife against him. Now amongest the other miseries & calamities of the poore citie of THE BES, there were certaine THEACIAN fouldiers, who having spoyled and defaced the house of Timoclea, a vertuous ladie and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them; and their captaine hauing rauished her by force, asked her, whether she had any where hidden and gold or filuer. The ladie told him, she had. Then leading him into her garden, she brough him vnto a well: where the faid the had cast all her inells and precious things, when the heard the citie was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN stouped to looke into the well: she standing behind him, thrust him in, and then threw stones enow on him, and so killed him. The soul, diers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and so caried her vnto Alexander. When Ale xander faw her countenance, & marked her gate: he supposed her at the first to be some great lady, she followed the fouldiers with such a maiestie & boldnes. Alexader the asking her what she was: She aunswered, that she was the sister of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHERONEA, where being generall he was flaine, valiantly fighting for the defense of the libertie of GRECE. Alexander wondering at her noble aunswere and couragious deede, comaunded no man shoud touche her nor her children, & so freely lether goe whether the would. He made league also with the Athenians, though they werever fory for their miserable fortune. For the day of the solemne feast of their misteries being come they left it of, mourning for the Therans: courteoutly enterteining all those, that flying from C THEBES came to them for succour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him , following therein the nature of lyons: or bycause that after so great an example of crueltie, he would shew a singuler elemency againe: he did not only pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to looke wifely to their doings, for their citie one daie should commaund all GRECE, if he chaunced to die. Men report, that certenly he oftentimes repented him that he had delt fo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke apon it was cause that he afterwardes shewed him selfe more mercifull vnto diuers others. Afterwardes also he did blame the furie of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clim at the table being droncke, and the MACEDONIANS also to refuse him to goe any furtherm conquer the Indians, which was an imperfection of his enterprise, and a minishing also of D his honor. Besides, there was neuer Theban afterwardes, that had escaped the furie of his vi-Ctorie, and did make any peticion to him, but he had his fute. Thus was the state of THERE as you have heard. Then the GRECIANS having affembled a generall counsell of all the states of GRECE within the straights of Peloponne fus: there it was determined that they would make warre with the Persians. Whereupon they chose Alexander generall for all Grece. Then divers men comming to visite Alexander, as well philosophers, as gouernors of states, to congratulate with him for his electio, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at Corinta) would likewise come as the rest had done: but when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the suburbes of CORINT HE, at a place called CRANIVM, he went him selse vnto him, and found him layed all a long in the funne. When Diogenes faw fo many comming E towardes him, he sate vp a litle, and looked full apon Alexander. Alexander courteously spake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thinge. Yea faid he, that I do: that thou stand out of my funne a litle. Alexander was fo well pleafed with this aunswere, and maruelled fo much at the great boldnes of this man, to fe how small account he made of him: that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familliers laughing at Diogenes, & mocking him, he told them: masters say what you lyst, truely if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being desirous to heare what the oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN would say vnto him touching the succeffe of his iorney into As 1 A: he went vnto the citie of DE LPHES. It chaunced for that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man yfed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first vnto the Nunne which pronounced the oracles, F to pray her to come to him. But the refused to come, alleaging the custome which forbad her to goe. Now inotwithstanding that he beganne this warre with fo small ability to mainteine it he would never take shippe before he understood the state of his frendes to know what abilitie they had to goe with him, and before he had genen vnto some landes, and vnto other, a towne, and to others agains, the custore of some hauen. Thus by his bounde hauing in maner spent almost the rouenues of the the spent sie of Alexacrowne of MACEDON, Perdiecas asked him : my Lord, what will you kepe for your felfer hope, dan favd he. Then, a Perdice as againe, we will also have some parte, since we goe with you : and C forefuled the revenue which the king had geven him for his pencion. Many others did alfo the like. But fuch as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, his gaue them very franckly, and in such liberallitie (pent all the revenue he had. With this defier & determination, he went on to the firaight of Hellespont, & going to the citie of ILLYM. hedid facrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy goddes (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whose bodies where buried there) and specially ynto Achilles, whose graue he annointed with oyle, and ranne naked round about it with his familiers according to the auncient custome of funeralls. Then he covered it with notegaves and flowers, faying, that Achilles was happy, who while he lived had a faithfull freind, and after Mexanders his death an excellent herauld to finge his praise. He aunswered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who played & sunge apon it all the famous actes done by valliant men in former times. In the meane time, Darine king of PERSIA, having leavied a great armie, fent his captaines and levetenants to tary Alex xander at the river of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessitie; being the onely barre to ftoppe his entrie into A sta. Moreouer the captaines of his counfell about him, were afraid of the depth of this river, and of the height of the bancke on thother fide, which was verichie and steepe, & could not be wonne without fighting. And some said also, that he should haue speciall care of the auncient regard of the moneth: bycause the kings of MACE DON did neuer vie to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is Iune. For that, faid Alexander, we will remedy foone: let them call it the fecond moneth, Arremifium, which is Maye. Furthermore Parmenie was of opinion, that he should not medle the first day, by cause it was very late. Alexander made auniwere againe, that HELLESPONT would blush for shame, if he were now affraid to passe ouer the river, fince he had already commen ouer an arme of the sea. Thereupon he him selfe first entred the river with thirteene guidons of horsemen, and marched forwardes against an infinite nomber of arrowes which the enemies shot at him, as he was comming up the other bancke, which was very highe and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which stayed to receive him in battell rave, thrufling his men downe into the river, which was very deepe, and ranne fo fwife, that it almost caried them downe the streame: infomuch that men thought him more rash than wife, to leade his men with fuch daunger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent that he would needes ouer, & in thend with great a doc recoursed the other fide, specially by cause the earth flidde away, by reason of the mudde. So when he was ouer, he was driven to fight pelmel one

Alexander had a blow with a dart of his high, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roefaces & Spithridates, both two chiefe captaines of the Passians, fetting apon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Roefaces, we will exceed the passians of the passians are straight drew out his sword. But so some steey two had closed together, spithidates coming at toessed of him, raised him selfe vpon his stirroppes and gaue Alexander with all his might such a blow of his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creast of his helmet, and one of the sides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very heare of his head. And as he was listing up his hand to strike Alexander againe, great the suppression of the strength of

Now whilest the horsemen sought with such sure; the squadron of the battell of sootemen of the MACEDONIANS had passed the river, and both the battells beganne to march one against the other. The Persians stuckenot mansfully to it any long time, but straight turned their backs and sled, saving the Grecians which tooke paie of king Darius: they drew together you a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horsekilled vnder him, being thrust through the slancke with a sword. This was not Bucephal, but an other horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurr at this backles, were hurte amongest them valliantly signifying against descrete are. It is never that discretion, had his horse killed under him, being thrust through the slancke with a sword. This was not Bucephal, but an other horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurte amongest them valliantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were flaine at this first battell, twenty thowsand footemen of these barbarous people, & two thowsand fine hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were flaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footemen. Alexander to honor their valliantnes, caused every one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And bycause he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent vnto the ATHE NI ANS three hundred of their targettes, which he had wonne at the battell, and generally you all the other spoiles, he put this honorable inscription. Alexander the some of Philip, and the Gracians, excepting the Lacedamonians, have wonne this spoile apon the barbarous Asians. Assor plate of gold or filuer, also purple filkes, or other such precious ware which he gat among the PERSIANS: he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victorie of Alexander, brought such a sodaine chaunge amongest the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the citie selse of Sardis, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the least through all the lowe contries and coastes apon the sea, they yeelded straight vnto him, saving the cities of Halicarnassys and Miletym, which did still resist him: howbeit at length he tooke the by force. When he had also conquered all thereabouts, he stood in dout afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruelous desire, whotly to follow Derius wherefoeuer he were, and to venter all at a battell. An other time againe, he thoughtit better first to occupy himselfe in conquering of these low contries, & to make him selfe strong with the money and riches he should finde among them, that he might afterwardes be the better able to follow him. In the contrie of Lydia neere vnto the citie Xanthum, they fay there is a springe that brake of it selfe, and overflowing the banckes about it, cast out a lite table of copper from the bottome, ypon the which were graued certen carectes in olde letters, which faid: that the kingdome of the Persians should be distroyed by the Grecians. This did further so encorage Alexander, that he made hast to cleere all the sea coast, enemas farre as Cilicia and Phoenicia. But the wonderfull good success she had, runninge alongest all the coast of Pamphilia, gaue diuers historiographers occasion to set forth his doinges with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the worlde, that the sure of the sea, which vnto all other was extreame roughe, and many times would swell ouer the toppes of the higher ockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Menander

After that he ouercame also the PISIDIANS, who thought to have resisted him, and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the citie of Gordive synthesis should be the auncient seate of king Middes he saw the charret that is so much spoke of, which is bound Gordius in with the barcke of a cornell tree, and it was rold him for a trothe of the barckerosis people where Propries where Propri

It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing to vndoe that bande, and finding no endes to vndoe it by, they were for many folde wreathed one within the other: he drew out his fword, and cut the knot in the middelt, So that then many endes appeared. But Arifobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the chartet and fo feuered them a foonder. Departing thence, he conquered the Paphlagonians & Cappadoeians, and vnderflood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius generall of his army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withfand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to goe on with his determination to leade his army into the highe contries of Asia. Then did

this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did fignifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS

Howbeit it was by reason of a sicknes he had, the which some say he got, by examine paines and trauell, & others also, by cause he washed him selfe in the riner of Cydnus, so which was cold as Ise. How soeuer it came, there was none of the other phistians that dust cydnus should be the content of the other phistians that dust cydnus should be the content of the other phistians that dust cydnus should be a content of the conte

In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a letter from the campe, aduertising him, that he should beware of Philip his phistian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches, that he would geue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his master. Alexander when he had redde this letter, layed it vinder his beddes

The wonder head, and made none of his neerest familliers acquainted therewith. When the however the that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings famile liers. & brought a cup in his hand with the pocion he should drinke. Alexander then gauchim the letter, & withall, cheerefully tooke the cup of him, shewing no maner of seare or mistrast of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the fight, how one reading the letter, and thother drinking the medicine both at one instant, they looked one apon another, howhere not both with like cheerefull countenaunce. For Alexander looked merily apon him , plainly shewing the trust he had in his phisitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phistian also beheld Alexander, like a man perplexed & amazed, to be so failly accused, & straight lift vo his handes to heauen, calling the goddes to witnesse that he was innocent, and the came to Alexanders bed fide, and prayed him to be of good cheere, and boldly to doe as to would aduise him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the disease, and draue for the time, to the lowest partes of his body, all his naturall strength and powers: in somuch as his freach failed him, and he fell into fuch a weaknes, and almost sooning, that his pulse did scare beate, and his sences were welneere taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few days recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed him selfopenly vnto the MACEDONIAN s: for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health vntill they had seene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a MACE DONIANA banisht out of his contrie, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Daries ment to meete with Alexander within the straightes and vallies of the mountaines: besomete him to tarie rather where he was, being a plaine open contrie round about him, confidering (usyntas profithat he had a great hoste of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was most for hisaluantage to meete with him in the open field. Darine aunswered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amynt as replied, for that, 0 king, I praie you feare not for I warrant you apon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way comming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntas could not tune Darius from making his campe to marche towardes CILICIA. At the felfe fame time also, Alexander went towardes Syria to meete with him. But it chaunced one night, that the one of them missed of the other, and when day was come, they both retorned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this happe, & making hast to meete with his enemy within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army D out of the straites: beganne then to find the fault & error committed, for that he had shuthin felfe up in the straights, (holden in on the one side with the mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the river of Pindarus that ranne between both) and that he was driven to disperse his armie into diuers companies, in a stonie and ill fauored contrie, ill for horsemen to travell being on the contrarie fide a great advantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footemen, and but few in nomber. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wishe it to fight for his advantage: so could be tell excellently well how to set his men in battell raye to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leffe nomber by many then his enemie, yet he had fuch policy and cast with him, that he foresaw all, and would not be enrine in a pa-rine in Cilicia. Mironned: For he did put out the right winge of his battell a great deale further, then he did E his left winge, and fighting him felfe in the left winge in the foremost ranckes, he made all the barbarous people flie that stood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thighe with a blow of a fword. Chares writeth, that Darius selfe did hurte him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding Alexander selfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater sayeth, thatin deede he was hurte on the thighe with a fword, howbeit it did put him in no daunger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurte him. Thus having wonne a famous victory, and flaine about a hundred and tenne thowfand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius, bycaufe he fled, having still foure or five forlonges vantage before him: how beit he tooke his charriot of battell wherein he fought, and his bow also. Then he retorned from the chase, & found the Ma-

A rent, which was full of a great nomber of officers, of riche moueables, and of gold and filuer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting of his armor, he entred into the bathe and fived: come on, lette vs goe and washe of the sweate of the battell in Darius owne bathe. Nave, replyed one of his familliers againe, in Alexanders bathe: for the goodes of the yanquished are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bathe, and sawe the basons and vewers, the boxes, and vyolles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed passing sweetely, that it was like a parradife: then going out of his bathe. and comming into his tent, feeing it fo stately and large, his bedde, the table, and supper, and all ready in fuch fumptuous fort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familliers and id: this was a king in deede, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to goe to his supperdwas brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongest other Ladies taken prithers, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried, who having Darius mothere, wife, and feene his chariot and bowe, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of them selues 100 deserbires. thinking Darius had bene staine. Alexander pawfed a good while and gaue no aunswere, pit- saken by Alewing more their misfortune, then reioycing at his owne goodhappe. Then he presently sent xondar. one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderstand, that Darius was a line, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexader, for he did not fight with Darins, but for his kingdome only. and as for them, that they should have at his handes all that they had of Darius before, when of Alexander he had his whole kingdome in his handes. As these wordes pleased the captive Ladies, so the vote the cadeedes that followed, made them finde his clemencie to be no leffe. For first he suffred them prine Ladies. toburie as many of the Persian Lordes as they would, euen of them that had bene flaine in the battell, and to take as much filkes of the spoiles, itells, and ornamentes, as they thought good to honor their funeralles with & also did lessen no parte of their honor, nor of the nomber of their officers and feruauntes, nor of any jotte of their estate which they had before bus did allowe them also greater pencions, then they had before. But aboue all, the princely est grace, and most noble fauor that Alexander shewed vnto these captine princesses, which had The thasfinie alwayes lived in honorable fame and chastitie, was this: That they never heard worde, or fo much as any suspicion that should make them asrayed to be dishonored or deflowed: but were privately among them felues vnuifited or repayred vnto by any man, but of their owne, notas if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in some close monasterie: although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a kinge, as I suppose to conquer him selse, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touche them nor any other, maide or wife, before he maned them, Bar sine onely excepted, who being left Memnons widow (generall of kinge Darius by sea) was taken by the citie of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good enterteinment (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kingers daughter) Alexander was bolde with her by Parmenioes procurement, (as Aristobulus writeth) who intifed him to embrace the companie of fo excellent a woman, and palling faire besides. Furthermore, beholding the other Persian Ladies besides which were Mexanders prisoners, what goodly faire women they were: he spake it pleasauntly, that the Ladies of pleasans spech PERSIA made mens eyes fore to behold them. Notwithstanding, preferring the beautie of beautie hiscontinencie, before their sweete faire faces: he passed by without any sparke of affection towardes them, more then if they had bene images of stone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his lieutenaunt in the lowe contries apon the sea coast, wrote vito him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchaunt of TARENTVM, had to fell two goodly young boies, maruelous faire: and therefore that he fent vnto him to knowe his pleasure, if he would by e them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out alowde: O, my frendes, what villany hath euer Philoxenus feene in me, that he should deuise (having nothing to doe there) to purchace me fuch infamie? whereuppon he wrote vnto him from Ethecampe, with reprochfull wordes, that he should send that vile TARENTIN marchaunt Theodorus and his marchaundise to the Deuill. He sharpely punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would bye a young boye called Grobylus (who for beautie bare the onely,

name in CORINTHE,) and bring hin to him. An other time also, when he heard that Danie A and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, under Parmenioes charge, had deflowed two of the fouldier wives that were straungers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them giltie of the rape, that then he should put them both to death, as brute beaftes borne to destroie mankinde. And in that letter he wrote thus of him selfe. For my selfe, said he, I haue neither seene, nor desired to see Darius wife : neither haue I suffred any speach of her beawtie before me. Moreouer he saied, that he did vnder. ftand that he was mortall by these two thinges: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weake. nes of our nature proceedeth fleepe and fenfualitie. He was also no greedy gutte, but ten. perate in eating, as he shewed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he faide vnto the pris cesse Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For which (for the loue she bare him) she daily sent him fundrie delicate dishes of meate, tartes, marchpaines, and befides the meate it felfe, the gaftlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he aunswered that he could not tell what to doe with them, for How Leonidas he had better cookes than those appointed him by his gouernour Leonidas, to witte: forhis diner, to rife before daye; and to marche by night: and for his supper, to eate litle at diner. And my gouernour, faid he, would oftentimes open the cheftes where my bedding and apparell lay, to fee if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceites among them. Fur. thermore, he was lesse genen to wine, then men would have judged. For he was though to be a greater bibber than he was, bycause he sate longe at the bourde, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound some tedious matter, and yet but when (he was at leylure. For having matters to doe, there was neither feaste, bancket, plaie, mariage, nor any pastime that could staie him: as they had done other captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the shortenes of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deedeshe did, in that little time he lived. When he had leyfure, after he was vp in the morning, fift of all he would doe facrifice to the goddes, and then would goe to diner, passing awaical the rest of the daye, in hunting, writing some thinge, taking vp some quarell between soul diers, or els in studying. If he went any journey of no hastie busines, he would exercise him felfe by the waie as he went, shooting in his bowe, or learning to get vp or out of his change fodenly, as it ranne. Oftentimes also for his pastime he would hunte the foxe, or ketche birdes, as appeareth in his booke of remembraunces for euerie daie. Then when he camend his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and nointe him felfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his supper were ready. He would ener suppelate, and was very curious to fee, that enery man at his bourde were a like ferued, and would fit longe at theu ble, bycause he euer loued to talke, as we have told you before. Otherwise he was as noblea prince and gracious to waite apon, and as pleasaunt, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelines to adorne a prince, fauing that he would be something ouer bussein glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging fouldier: neither was he contented him selse to please his owne humour that waie, but would also suffer his familliers to soothe him euen to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would neither praise him in his presence, hating the flatterers, not yet durst saye E leffe of the praifes which they gaue him . For of the first they were ashamed, and by the second they fell in daunger. After supper, he would washe him selfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next daye following, and oftentimes all daye longe. For him felfe, he was nothing curious of dainty dishes: for when any did send him rare frutes, or fishe, from the contries neere the sea side, he would send them abroad vnto his frendes, and seldom kepe any thinge for him felfe. His table notwithstanding was alwayes very honorably served, and did still increace his fare, as he did enlarge his conquestes: till it came to the summeof tenne thowfand drachmas a daye. But there he stayed, and would not exceede that summe; and moreover commaunded all men that would feast him, that they should not spend about that summe. After this battell of Issvs, he sent vnto the citie of DAMAS, to take all the F gold and filuer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the Persians which were left there, where the men of armes of the Thessalians spedde them full well. For therefore

A didhe fend them thither, by cause he sawe that they had sought valliantly at the daye of the hartell: and so were the reste of his armie also well stored with money. There the MACE nonians having tafted first of the golde, filter, women, and barbarous life; as dogges by cent doe follow the tracke of beaftes, euen so were they greedy to follow after the goodes of the PERSIANS. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coaste. Thether came the kinges of Cyprus, and Phoenicia, and delinered up to him the whole Iland & all Phoe-NICIA, fauing onely the citie of Tyre. That citie he befeeged feuen moneths together by Mexander lande, with great bulwarkes and divers engines of batterie, and by fea, with two hundred gal- cities Type. lies. During this fege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto Mexanders him ouer the walles of the citie, and called him by his name; and there were diuers Tyrians drame as the Fallo that dreamed in likewife, that Apollo told them that he would goe vnto Alexander, byranse he was not pleased with their doinges in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image. (which was of a wonderfull bignes) with grat chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base. asifhe had bene a traitour that would have yeelded him felfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauoring Alexander. Alexander had there also an other dreame. Alexanders For he dreamed that he sawe a Satyre a farre of sporting with him, and when he thought to agains as haue commen neere to haue taken him, he still escaped from him; vntill at the length, after Tyre. hehad ronne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his handes. The foothefavers being asked what this dreame should fignifie, aunswered probably, by deuiding Satyros into two, and then it is sarie. which fignifieth, the citie of Tyne shalbe thine. And they of doe vet show vnto this daie, the fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the Satyre. Con- Mexanders tinuing this feege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell apon the moun-iorney against taine Antiliban, where he was in great daunger of being cast away, onely bycause he heard Intiliban his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, saye bostingly, that he was not inferior, nor older mone. than the Phoenix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horses, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of fo courteous a nature, that he would not leave his tutor Lysimachus behind him (who was so wery that he could goe no further) but bycause it was darke night, & for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encorage his tutor, and in maner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreover it was very colde, and D the waie was very ill. At the length, perceyuing divers fires which the enemies had made, some in one place, and some in an other, trusting to his valliantnes, having alwayes prouidedremedie in extremitie, when the MACEDONIANS were distressed, him selfe ever putting to his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of The corage the barbarous people that laye by the firefide, he snatched awaye a fire brand, and ranne of Alexander. with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were for affraid, that they ranne their waye as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and sette vppon him, he flue them enery man, and so lave there that night, him selfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the feege of Tyre, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most parte of his armie to take rest, being ouerharried and, E wearyed with formany battelles as they had fought: and fent a few of his men onely to gene affault vnto the citie, to kepe the Tyrians occupied, that they should take no rest. One daye the foothefayer Aristander facrifycing vnto the goddes, having confidered of the fignes. of the intralles of the beaftes : did affure them that were present, that the citie should be taken by the later ende of the moneth. Euery bodie laughed to heare him: for that days was thevery last daye of the moneth. Alexander seeing him amated, as one that could not tell, what to faie to it, feeking ever to bringe those tokens to effect, which the soothesayers did prognosticate: commaunded them that they should not reckon that daye the thirtie day, but the leuen and ewentie, and immediatly upon it, made the trompet founde the allarme, & geue a hotter affault to the walle, then he had thought to have done before. They fought valliantly Fon both fides, in fo much as they that were left in the campe, could not kepe in, but must needs. The stille of runne to thatfault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS feeing thatfault fo hot on every and taken by side, their hartes began to faile them, and by this meanes was the citie taken the selfe same day. Alexander.

An other time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe citie of SYRIA, there fell a a clodde of earth upon his shoulder, out of the which there sewe a birde into the ayer. The birde lightinge apon one of the engines of his battrie, was cought with the nettes made of finewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Ariftander did prognosticate, that is fignified he should be hurt in his shoulder, notwithstading, that he should yet take the towne. And in deede so it came to passe. When he sent great presentes of spoiles which he wanne at the facke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and divers others of his frendes. among other thinges, he fent vnto Leonidas his gouernor, fiue hundred talentes waighted frankensence, and a hundred talentes waight of myrre: remembring the hope he put him in. to when he was a childe. For , as Alexander was vpon a daye facrifycing vnto the goddes, he tooke both his handes full of frankensence to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof When his gouernour Leonidas faw him, he faied thus vnto him: When thou hast conque. red the contrie where these sweete thinges grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this forte: we do fend thee plenty of frankensence & myrre, bicante thou shouldest no more be a niggard vnto the goddes. There was brought vnto him alitte coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thinge and the richest, that was got ten of all the spoiles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familliers that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thinge to be put into it. Some faid one thinge, some faid an other thinge: but he faid, he would put the Ilia. des of Homer into it as the worthiest thinge. This is confirmed by the best historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXAND RIANS report vpon Heraclides wordes, be true: then it and peareth that he did profitte him felfe much by Homer in this iorney. For it is reported that The building when he had conquered ÆGYPT, he determined to builde a great citie, and to replenish is of the citie of with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certen ground, which he had chosen by thaduise of his enginers and workens. sters: the night before he had a maruelous dreame, that he sawe an olde man standing before him, full of white heares, with an honorable presence, and comming towardes him faid these verses.

Affoone as he rose the next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle about the mouth of the river of Nylus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now joyned vnto firme lande, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barteof earth, broade enough, that seperateth a great lake on the one side, and the sea on thother the which doeth joyne hard to a great hauen. Then he faid that Homer was wonderfull in all his thinges, but that amongest others, he was an excellent Architecture: and commannded, that straight they should cast the platforme of the citie, according to the fituation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driven to take meale, and with that did marke out voon the earth being blacker E the compasse of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equals partes, either of them resembled the skirtes and facion of the MACEDON FAN cloke, Alexander liked this draught paffingly well. But there role apon the fodaine out of the riner or lake, fuch an infinite multitude of great fowle of all forces, that they covered the element as it had bene a clowde, and lighting within this circuite, did cate vp all the meale, and left not a crummer Alexander liked not these fignes. Notwithstanding, his soothsayers bad him not be discorted ged, for they told him it was a figne that he should build a circe there, so plentifull of all thinges, that he should mainteine all forces of people. Then he commaunded them, and whom he had gener the charge of the building, that sheyshould goe forward with their worke, and he him felfe in the meane time, tooke his iorney to goe vifite the temple of Jupic R ter Hammon. The Iorney was long, and there were many troubles by the waie, but two dames gers about all the rest most speciall. The first, lacke of water, by cause they had to travell many

A deves iorney through a great defert. The second was, the daunger of the riling of the souther winde by the waie, to blow the fand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is renorted, that on a time there rose such a tempest in that desert, that blew we whole hilles of and, which flue fiftie thowfand men of Cambyfes armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did Combyfes arknowthese daungers very well: howbeit it was hard to disswade Alexander from any thing in plant to which he had a defire vnto. For , fortune fauoring him in all his attemptes , made him conflant and resolute in his determinations: and his noble corage besides, made him inuincible in all thinges he tooke in hand, in fomuch as he did not only compell his enemies, but he had nowerallo of time and place. In that voyage, in stead of these former daungers spoken of he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the goddes, by the oracles I that followed afterwardes. For in a certen forte, they have beleved the oracles that were writrenofhim. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that fell from the element did kenehim from feare of the first daunger, and did quenche their thirst, and moysted the drienes of the fand in such sorte, that there came a swete freshe aver from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to shew them the waie, and that they wandred up and downe, they could not tell where: there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying the ded Alexader before them: flying fast when they saw them follow them, and stayed for them when they in his lange. were behind. But Callisthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right waie which had lost their waie. Thus Alexander in thend, having passed through this wildernes, he came voto. the temple he fought for: where, the prophet or chiefe priest saluted him from the god Hanmon: as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The priest aunswered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaspheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe reherfing that he had fipoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conspired the death of Philip his father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to be king ouerall the world. The god aunswered him by the mouth of his prophet, he should: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great presentes vnto the gods: and gaue money large to the priefts, & ministers of the temple. This is that the most parte of writers doe declare, touching Alexanders demaund and the oracles genen him . Yet did Ale-D xander him felfe write vnto his mother; that he had fecret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his retorne into MACEDON. Others faie also, that the prophet meaning to falute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would have faid vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deere fonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, by+ cause the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter ende, say, ing, O Pai dios, to wit, O fonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking, Whereupon there ranne a rumor straight among his men, that Impirer had called him his fonne. It is faid also, that he heard Pfammon the philosopher in Egypt, and that he liked his The faring of wordes very well, when he faide that god was king of all mortall men: For (o he) he that philosopher of commaundeth all things, must needes be god. But Alexander selfe spake better, and like a phir the losopher, when he faid: That god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particu- of God. larly he did elect the best forte for him selfe. To conclude, he shewed him selfe more arrogant.

vito the barbarous people, and made as though he certainly beleved that he had bene begotten of some god: but white GR ECIANS he spake more modestly of diuine generation. Par forth god in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the citie of SAMOS, he said: I gaue ye not, see a some that noble free citie, but it was genen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord & full. father: meaning Philip. Afterwardes also being striken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My frendes faid he, This blood which is foilt, is mans blood, and not as Homer faid, No fuch as from the immortall gods doth flow.

And one day also in a maruelous great thunder, when every man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rethoritian being present, said vnto him: O thou some of Impiter, wilt thou doe as much? no faid he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my frends, as thou wouldest have me: distaining the service of fishe to my borde, by cause thou seest not princes heades served in.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. 738 And the report goeth also, that Alexander upon a time sending a litle fishe unto Heplesian, a Anaxarchus should saye as it were in mockery, that they which aboue others feeke for fine with great trouble and hazard of life, have either small pleasure in the world, or els as like as others have. By these proofes and reasons alleaged, we maie thinke that Alexander has no vaine nor prefumptuous opinion of him felfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begottened a god, but that he did it in policie to kepe other men vnder obedience, by the opinion cos. ceiued of his godhead. Retorning out of Phoenicia into Egypt, he made many facrifices feaftes, and precessions in honor of the goddes, fondry daunces, Tragedies, and such like has ftimes goodly to behold: not onely for the fumptuous fetting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the fetters forth of them, which striued every one to exceede the other, For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the fetters of them forth, as at A THENS they drawn by lot a citizen of enery tribe of the people, to defraie the charges of these pastimes. These kinges were very earnest who should doe best, but specially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINAM CYPRVS: and Passerates, Lord of the citie of Soles. For it fell to their lor to fournish two of the excellentest plaiers, Pasicrates fournished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus : whom 4: lexander loued fingularly well, though he made no thew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was de clared victor, by the judges deputed to geue sentence. For when he went from the plain he told them he did like the judges opinion well, notwithflanding, he would have bene come tented to have genen the one halfe of his realme, not to have feene Thessalus overcome. Ather modorus being condemned upon a time by the ATHENIANS, bycause he was not in ATHENS arthe feaftes of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaied, and a fine fer of his C head for his absence: he besought Alexader to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penalty. Alexander would not so doe, but sent thether his money whereof he was condemned, and paide it for him of his owne purfe. Also when Lycon S CARPHIAN, an exedlene stage player had pleased Alexander well, and did soiste in a verse in his comedy, comes ning a petition of tenne talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him . Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certen of his frendes also, to pray him to take tenne thousand unto Alexan- tallentes for the raumfon of all those prisoners he had in his handes, and for all the contries landes and fignories on this fide the river of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in ma riage, that from thence forth he might be his kinfman and frend. Alexander imparted this his counfell. Amongest them Parmenio said vnto him: if I were Alexander, op he, surely I would D accept this offer. So would I in deede, of Alexander againe, if I were Parmenio. In fine hewrone againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit him selfe, he would vie him courteously; if not that then he would prefently marche towardes him. But he repented him afterwardes, when

Stating, king Darins wife was dead with childe : For without diffimulation it greeued him much other he had loft so noble an occasion to shew his courteste and elemencie. This notwithstanding died in trasel he gaue her body honorable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongest the Eunuches of the of childe. queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexanders campe, taking his horse backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, & weping bitterly, cried out alowd: Oh goddes what wretched happe haue the PBRSIANS? that haue not onely had the wife and fifter of their E king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that she is dead also in travell of childe; she hath bene depriued of princely buriall? Then spake the Eunuch to him, and said: For herburiall most gracious king, & for all due honor that might be wisshed her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilest she lined prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any parte or iot of their honor they were wont to have before, fauing onely to fee the light of your honour, the which, god Oromafdet graunt to restore againe (if it be his will) vnto your maiestie: neither was there any honor wanting at her death (to fet forth her stately funeralles) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in victoric, as he is vallrant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in minde for very E griefe: tooke the Eunuche aside into the secretest place of his tent, and said vnto him. If thou be not, with the misfortune of the Persians, becomen 2 Macedonian, but doest in the

Tiness the cunuch fell downe on his knees, & befought him not to fay fo, neither to bleamish the vertue of Alexander in that force, nor yet fo to diffeonor his fifter and wife deceafed and thereby also to deprive him selfe of the greatest comfort he could wish to have in this calami-I the which was, to be ouercome by an enemy that had greater vertues than a man could politic bly haue: but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had showed him felfe shafter to the Ladies, than valliant against the Persians, And therewithall, the cunuch confirmed the great honesty, chastity, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe The comments othes. Then Darius comming out among his frendes againe, holding vp his handes vnto the dation of A. heavens, made this prayer vnto the gods. Divers writers do agree, 35 that these things came even thus to passe, Now Alexander having conquered all As in on this promise of fide of the river of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hun of time him and dred thowfand fighting men. It was told him by some of his frendes to make him laugh, that theslaues of his army had deutided them selues in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall against Aleof either parte, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius; and that at the first, they bet xander, at the game to skirmish only with cloddes of earth, and afterwardes with fiftes, but at the last, they river of En-grew fo hot, that they came to plaine stones and staues, so that they could not be parted. D xander hearing that would needes have the two Generalls fight hand to hand one with the of ther; and Alexander felfe did arme him that was called Alexander, & Philosas the other which was called Darius. All the army thereupon was gathered together to fee this combar between the, as a thing that did betoker good or ill lucke to come. The fight was sharp between them. but in thend, he that was called Alexander our came the other; and Alexander to reward him. gave him twelve villages, with priviledge to goe after the Persian maner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darine, was notes many writers seport) at Arbeles, but at Gausameles, which signifieth in the Parsian tongue, the house of the cammell. For some one of the auncient kings of PERSIA that had scaped from the hands of his enemies, flying upon a drumbledary cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore E appointed the revenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipse of the moone, in the moneth called Boedromion (now August) about the time that the feast of the misteries was celebrated at ATHBNS. The eleuenth night after that both their armies being in fight of the other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went him felle by torche light viewing his bandes and companies. Alexander on thother fide whileft his Man CIDONIAN fouldiers slept, was before his tent with Aristander the Soothsayer, and made certaine fecret ceremonies and facrifices vnto Apollo. The auncient Captaines of the MACED &-RIAMS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the vallie between the river of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIETANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people; and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of people that filled their campe with the

bicaule the darkenes thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the fighast A their enemies would bring them into But then he gaue them this notable aunswere. I will a steale victorie, q he. This aunswere seemed very sonde and arrogant to some, that he was h pleasaunt, being neere so great daunger. Howebeit others thinke that it was a present noble corage, and a deepe confideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby to gene Dariss no maner of occasion (if he were ouercomen) to rake hart againe, and to proue ano. ther battell, accusing the darkenes of the night as cause of his ouerthrow: as he had dones the first conflict, imputing his ouerthrowe to the mountaines, the straights, and the sea, For favd he. Daring will neuer leave to make wartes with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, has uing so large a realme as he hath, & fuch a world of people befides: but then he will no more hasard battell, when his hart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he seeth his armen at noone dayes ouerthrowen by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layed him downe to fleepe, and flept all that night more foundly than he was wont to doe before: infomuch as the Lordes and Princes of his campe comming to waite apon him at his vprifing, marueled when they found him fo founde a fleepe, and there. fore of them felues they commaunded the fouldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiting that time came fast apon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and comming to his beddes fide, called him twife or thrife by his name, till at the last he waked him, and asked him howin chaunced that he flept fo long, like one that had already ouercome, & that did not thinke he should fight as great and daungerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, fayd Alexander laughing on him:doeft thou not thinke we have already ouercomen, being troubled no more C with running after Darius vp and downe a contrie vtterly destroyed, as we should otherwise haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue comen to battell, and destroyed the contrie before vs ? Now Alexander did not only thew him felfe before the battell, but even at the very instant of battell, a noble man of corage, and of great judgement. For Parmenioles. ding the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue such a sierce onfer VDOn the MACEDONIANS, that they made them geue backe: and Mazeus also, king Darink Lieutenant, sent certaine troupes of horsemen out of their battell, to gene charge vpon them that were left in the campe to garde the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, sent immediatly to aductife Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be lost, if he did not fend presently to aide the rereward. When these newes came to Alexander D from Parmento, he had already genen the fignall of battell vnto his men for to gene charge. Whereupon he aunswered the messenger that brought him these newes, that he should tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wanne the battell, they should not only saue their owne cariage, but also winne the cariage of their enemissi &if it were their chaunce to lose it, then that they should not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their flaues, but only to thinke to dye honorably, valliantly fighting for his life. Having fent this message vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The rest of his armor for his body, he The arms of had put it on before in his tent, which was, a Sicilian cassocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many foldes of canuas with oylet holes, which was gotten among the spoyles at the battell of Issvs. His head peece was as bright as filuer, made by Theophilm the armorer this E coller futelike to the same, all set full of pretious stones, and he had a sword by his side, matnelous light, and of excellent temper, which the king of the CITIBIANS had genen him, * fing commonly to fight with his fword at any let battel. His coate armor was maruelous tiells and of sumptuous workemanshippe, farre about all the rest he ware. It was of the workemanshippe of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a present, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did fet his men in battell ray, or made any or m tion vnto them, or did ryde alongest the bands to take view of them: he alwayes yied to ryde vpon an other horse to spare Bucephal, bicause he was then somewhat olde: notwithstanding; when he ment in deede to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, and as foone as he was gotten vp on his backe, the trompet founded, & he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long ? exhortacions to incorage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS, and the other GRECIANS alfo, and when they had all promised him they would sticke to him like men, and prayed him

A to lead them, and gene charge uppon the enemies the tooke his launce in his left hande, and holding up his right hande unto heaven, befought the goddes (as Callifthenes writeth) that if ir were true, he was begenten of lupiter, that it would please them that day to helpe him, and to encorage the GRECIANS. The Soothfayer Ariftander was then a horsebacke hard by Ale render, apparelled all in white, & a crowne of gold on his head, who shewed Alexander when hemade his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. An Eagle flee This marueloully encoraged all the armie that faw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of over Mexander that faw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of over dere brad, Alexanders fide, encoraging one an other, did fet spurres to their horse to charge apon the whenhe went enemies. The battell of the footemen of the Pers IANS, beganne a litle to geneway, and be- to fight with fore the foremest could come to geue them charge, the barbarous people turned their backs. Rand fled. The chase was great, Alexander driving them that fled uppon the middest of their owne battell, where Darius felfe was in person. He spied him a farre of ouer the foremest ranckes in the middeft of his battel, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a charriot of warre. compassed in rounde with great troupes of horsemen, all set in goodly ordinaunce to receive the enemy. But when they faw Alexander at hand with fo grimme a looke, chaling them that fled through those that yet kept their rancks there fell such a feare among them, that the most name dispersed them selves. Notwithstanding, the best and most valliantest men sought it out to the death before their king, and falling dead one apon an other, they did let them that the enemies could not fo well follow Darius. For they lying one by an other on the ground, draws ing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Daring Cthen feeing nothing but terror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bandes which he had let before him for fafegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his charriot forward nor backward, the wheeles were fo hindered and stayed with the heapes ofdead bodies, and that the horse also being fer apon and hidde in maner in this conslict, fell to leapinge and plunginge for feare, so that the charrettiers coulde no lenger guide nor drive them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had fole, and so faued him selfe flying apon her. And The flying of yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent vnto Alexander to pray him Davim. to come and aide him : bicause there was yet a great squadron whole together that made no countenaunce to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to haug delt but flackely and cowardly, either bicaufe his age had taken his corage from him, or elfe D forthat he enuied Alexanders greatnes and profectity, who against his will became ouer great as Callifthenes fayd. In fine, Alexander was angry with the fecond mellage, and yet told not his men truely the cause why, but faining that he would have them leave killing, and bicause also night came on : he caused the trompet found retreate, and so went rowards his army, whom hethought to be in diffresse. Notwithstanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place also, they had genen the enemies the ouerthrowe, and that they fled enery way for life. The battell having this fuccesse, every man thought that the kingdom of the PER SIANS Was Alexanders viterly ouerthrowen, and that Alexander likewife was become only king of all As in: wherethe third viterry pon he made sumptuous facrifices vnto the goddes, and gaue great riches, houses, lands and liberalise se possessions vnto his frendes and familliars. Furthermore, to shewe his liberalitie also vnto the all men. E GRECIANS, he wrote vinto them, that he would have all tyrannies suppressed through out all GRECE, and that all the GRECIANS should live at libertie under their owne lawest Particular larly also he wrotevnto the PLATBIANS, that he woulde reedifie their citie against, bicause their predeceffors in time past, had genen their contrie vnto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the common libertie of all G n. a.c. He fenral fo into LEATURE VINTO THE GROTTONIANS, parte of the spoyle, to honor the memory of the valliantics, me good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of the warres with the Muses, (when will the Gracians that dwelt in I tale had for faken their naturall contrie men of Grace it felfe, bicause they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a shippe of his vnto Satamina, which he armed and fet forth at his owne charges, bicause he would be at the battelland partake also of the common daunger with the GRECIANS: fuch honor did Alexan. deboard unto prowes, that he loued to reward & remember the worthy deedes of men. ALEXANDER THE GREAT. him. When he came into the contrie of the ECBAT ANIANS, he marueled when he saw and A pening of the earth, out of the which there came continual sparkes of fire as out of a well & *The Brength that hard by also the earth spued out continually a kinde of *mawnd or chalkie clay somewhat lyouid, of fuch aboundaunce, as it feemed like a lake. This maund or chalke is like vnto a kind of lyme or clay, but it is so easie to be sette a fire, that not touching it with any slame, by the brightnes only of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is fet afire, & doth also fet the aver a fire which is between both. The barbarous people of that contrie, being defirous to theme Alexander the nature of that Naptha, scattered the streete that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being thut in, they fired it at one of the endes, and the first droppes taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the streete to the other was of flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander a being in bath at that time, and waited apon by a page called Steuen: (a hard fauor ed boy, but vet that had an excellent sweete voyce to fing) one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwayer nointed & bathed the king, & much delighted him with his pleafaunt conceites, asked himif he would fee the triall of this Naptha apon Steuen : for if the fire tooke and went not out, then he would say it had a wonderfull force, and was vnquencheable. The page was contented m haue it proued apon him. But so soone as they had layed it on him, and did but touche it only. it tooke straight of such a slame, and so fired his body, that Alexander him selfe was in a maruelous perplexitie withall. And fure had it not bene by good happe, that there were many by ready with vessells full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpossible to have faued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet so he escaped narrowly, and besides was sickelone c. after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying that therwith she rubbed the crowne and lawne the gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, fo much spoken of

This digression is somwhat from the matter, but peraduenture the reader will not thinke it troublesome, howe hard soeuer he E Tresmesound finde it, so it be not ouer tedious. Alexander having wonne the city of Sv s.a., he found within by Alexander, the castell foure thowsand talentes in ready coyne, gold and filuer, besides other infinite nead fure and inestimable, amongest the which (it is sayd) he found to the value of five therefore talentes weight of * purple HERMIONA filke which they had fafe locked vp & kept the mace of two hundred yeres faue ten, and yet the colour kept as freshe as if it had bene newly in Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it, with the nie, in filkes which before had bene dyed redde, and with white oyle in white filkes. For, the are filkes seene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Bild writeth furthermore, that the kinges of Persia made water to be brought from the riners of Nylus and Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did locke vp with their other treasure F for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, and to shew that they were Lordes of the world. The wayes to enter into Panasia being very hard of paffage, and in maner ynpaffable,

A (both for the illnes of the wayes, as also for the gard that kept them, which were the choisest men of PBRSIA) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greeke and PBR-SIANtongue (whose father was borne in the contry of Lycia, & his mother a Parsian) that Mexanders guided Alexander into Persia, by some compasse fetched about not very long, according to profits. the Oracles aunswere of Alexander genen by the mouth of Nunne Pythias, when he was a shild: that a Lycian should guide and lead him against the Persians. There was then great flaughter made in Persia of the prisoners that were taken. For Alexander him selfe wryteth, that he commaunded the men should be put to the sword, thinking that the best way to serue his turne. It is fayd also, that there he found a maruelous treasure of gold and filuer in readic Mexander money, as he had done before in the citie of Svs A: the which he caried away with all the rest found a mer-Bofthe kinges rich wardroppe, and with it laded tenne thowsande moyles, and fine thowsande for the percammells. Alexander entring into the castell of the chiefe citie of PBRSIA, faw by chaunce a fia. great image of Xerxe's lye on the ground, the which vnwares was throwen downe by the multinde of the fouldiers that came in, thronging one apon an other. Thereupon he stayed, and bake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, faying: I can not tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lye, for the warre thou madeft somtime against the GR BCIANS: or whether I should

mute a long time, confidering of it, he went his way : and meaning to refresh his weary army, bicause it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure monethes together. The reporte goeth, that the first time that Alexander sate vnder the cloth of state of king Darius, all of rich

C golde: Demarathus Corinthian (who first beganne to loue him euen in his father Philippes time) burst out in teares for ioy, good old man, faying that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were deprined of this bleffed happe, to fee Alexander fet in king Xerxes princely chaier.

After that, preparing againe to goe against Darius, he would needes make mery one day, and refresh him selfe with some bancket. It chaunced so, that he with his companions was bidden to a private feast privately, where was affembled some fine curtisans of his familiars who with their frendes taried at the banket. Amongest them was that famous Thais, borne in the contry Theinstein of ATTICA, & then concubine to Ptolomy, king of ÆGYFT after Alexanders death. She finely boldnes of praising Alexander, and partely in sporting wife, began to vtter matter in affection of her contrie, but yet of greater importance than became her mouth: faying, that that day the founder D her felfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines she had take; travelling through all the contries of Asia, following of his armie, now that the had this fauor & good happe to be mery and pleafaunt, in the prowde and stately pallace of the great kings of Persia. But yet it would doe her more good, for a recreation, to burne Xerxes house with the fire ofioy, who had burnt the city of ATHENS: and her felfe to geue the fire to it, before so noble a Prince as Alexander. Bicause euer after it might be said, that the women following his campe, had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wronges and injuries they had done vnto GRECE: than all the Captaines of GRECE that ever were had done, either by lande or fea. When she had sayd, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands, and made great noise for ioy, saying: that it were as good a deede as could be possible, and perswaded Alexan-E der vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perswasions, rose vp, and putting a garland of flowers prosents see apon his head, went formest him selfe : and all his familliars followed after him, crying and a fireby Aledauncing all about the castell. The other MACED ONIANS hearing of italio, came thicker immediatly with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good figne that Alexander ment to return e againe into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the contrie of the barbarous people, fith he did burne and destroy the kings castell. Thus, and in this force it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwise: that it was not burnt with such sport, but by determination of the counsell. But howsoever it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did presently repenthim, and commaunded the fire to be quenched straight. For his liberality, that good will and readines to gene, increased with his conquestes: and when he did bestowe giftes of any,

he would besides his gift ener gene them good countenance, on whom he bestowed his grace

with an emptie cuppe. But I drinke to thee this cuppe full of good wine, and doe gene thee cuppe & all. An other time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the kings: and when the poore moyle was fo weary that the could no lenger cary he burden, the moyleter put it apon his owne backe, and loded him felfe withall, carying it foa good pretie way: howbeit in thende being ouerloden, was about to throwe it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was tolde him well, a he to the movletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I gene it thee, To be short . he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would aske him somewhat. He wrote also vnto Phosion, that he would take him no more for his frend, if he would refuse his giftes. It seemed that he had geuen nothing vnto a young R boy called Serapion (who euer did ferue them the ball that played at tenis) bicaufe he asked him nothing. Wherefore, the king playing on a time, this young boy threw the ball to others than played with him, and not to him felfe. The king marueling at it, at the length fayd vnto him why, my boy, doeft thou not geue me the ball? Bicaufe your maieftie doth not aske it me, he. Alexander then vnderstanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, & did much for him after. wards. There was attending on him also one Proteas, a pleasaunt conceited man, & that could flentfinely. It chaunced vpon some occasion that Alexander fell out with him: whereuppon fome of his frends were interceffors to the king for him, & befought him to pardon him; and Proteas him selfe also being present, craued pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgaue him. Then pleasauntly replied Proteas, I desire it may please your grace, that I may receiue some testimonie to affure me I am in your fauor. Thereuppon the king straight commaunded one to geue him fine talents. The goods and riches he gane vnto his famillians and gard about him, were very great, as it appeareth plainly by a letter which his mother on lympias wrote vnto him, to this effect : I know thou sparest not to gene thy frends large giftes. and that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them kings fellowes, they get many frendes, and leaue the poste alone without any. His mother did many times write such like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very secret, sauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephaltion being present drew neere, and red the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had red it, he plucked the feale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vie to feale his letters, and put it to Hephaltions mouth. He gave I also vnto the sonne of Mazem, (that was the chiefest man about Darius) a seconde gouenment, besides that which he had before, and greater than the first. This young noble mantefuled it, faying: why, and it please your grace, before there was but one Dariue, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio also, Bagoas house, where (as is reported) he found a thowfand talents worth, of the spoyles and goods of the Svsians. He wrote also vis to Antipater, that he should keepe a gard about his person, for he had many enemies that law in waite for him. He did fend also many goodly presents vnto his mother, but with all he wrote vnto her, that she would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her theoflice of a Captaine. She storming at it, he paciently did brooke her anger. Antipater an othertime; wryting a long letter vnto him against his mother Olympias, when he had red it ouer: loe, said I he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye will wipe out tenne thowsande fuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiving on a time, that his frendes became very diffolute & licentious in dyet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked shooes nayled with filter nayles, that Leonatus also caused divers cammells to be loden among est his carriage with powder of EGYPT, to put apon him when he wrestled or vied any other exercise of body: & that also they caried after Philotas, toyles for chase and hunting, of a hundred furlong long and that there were also that vsed pretious perfumes & swete sauors when they bathed them felues, more then there were that rubbed them felues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine

ly and curreously rebuked them and fayd. I maruell, fayd he, that you which have fought in fo F

s comparing your life, with the manner of the life of the Persians, to live at pleasure is a vile. thinge, and to trauell is Princely. And howe I pray you, can a man take paine to dreffe his owne horse, or to make cleane his launce or helmet, that for slothfull curiosities sake, disdaineth to rubbe his owne bodie with his fine fingers? Are you ignorant, that the type of honor mall our victorie confifteth, in scorning to doe that which we see them doe, whom we have vanquished and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint them selves Alexander, with hardnes: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard him felfe more enemy to be daungeroufly, then euer he had done before. Whereuppon an Ambaffador of LACED EMON heing present to see him fight with a Lyon, and to kill him, sayd vnto him : truely your grace hath fought well with this Lyon, and tried which of you two should be king. Graterus after that caused this hunting to be set up in the temple of Apollo in DELPHE s: where are the images of the Lyon, of the dogges, and of the king fighting with the Lyon, and of him felfe also that came to helpe him, all those images being of copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leotheres. Thus Alexander did put him felfe vnto all iuberdies, as well to exercise his strength and corage, as also to allure his men to doe the like. This notwithstanding, his frendes and familliars having wealth at will, as men exceeding riche, they would needes live delicately and at eafe, and would take no more paines, milliking veterly to goe vp and downe the contries to make warre here and there: and thereuppon beganne a little to finde fault with Alexander, and to speake euill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly, saying, that it was honor for aking to fuffer him felfe to be flaundered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turnes he did vnto his frendes, did shewe his hartie love and honor he bare them. as shall appeare vnto you by some examples that followe. Peucestas being bitten by a beare. didlet his frendes understande it by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof unto Alexander, A. Alexanders lexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus. Sende me worde at the least yet frendes and how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellowes did forsake thee at the hunting, to thende wonderfull they may be punished. Hepheltion being absent about certaine businesse he had. Alexander currefie towrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beaft called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunatelycroffinge Perdice as darte, was striken through both his thighes. Peucest as being cured of a great difease. Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phisitian that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus also being sicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine facilities for the recourie of his health, and fent vnto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phisitian Paulanias ment to geue him a drinke of Eelleborum, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what daunger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he received that medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Ciffus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus flying, bicause they did wrongfully accuse & slauder him. When he had comaunded there should be a bill made of all the olde mens names, and diseased persones that were in his campe, to fende them home againe into their contry: there was one Eurylochus A GEIAN that made his name be billed among the ficke persons, & it was found afterwardes that he was not ficke, and confessed that he did it only to follow a young woman called Telesippa, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewardes towardes the fea fide. Alexander asked him, E whether this woman were free or bond : he answered him, that she was a curtisan free borne. Then fayd Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I can not force her to tarie: but feeke to winne her by giftes and fayer wordes to be contented to tarie, sithence she is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to see what paines he would take, to write for his frendes, euen in fuch trifles as he did. As, when he wrote into CILICIA for a feruaunt of Seleucus that was fled from his mafter, fending straight commaundement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by an other letter he commendeth Peucestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a flaue of Craterus. And by one other letter also vnto Megabizus, touching an other bondman that had taken fanctuarie in a temple: he commaunded him also to feeke to intife him out of the fanctuarie, to laye hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to meddle with him in any case. It is sayd also, that at the first when he vsed to sit in judgement Alexander to heare criminall causes, whilest the accuser went on with his complaint and accusation: he keps one care alwayes vsed to lay his hande uppon one of his cares to keepe that cleane from the matter of direct one danied person. acculation, thereby referuing it to heare the purgacion and inflificacion of the performance demned. But afterwardes, the number of accusations that were brought before him, side prouoke and alter him, that he did beleue the falle accusations, by the great number of the true that were brought in . But nothinge put him more in rage, then when he vnderflood they had spoken ill of him : and then he was so sierce, as no pardon would be graunted, for that he loued his honor, more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went against Darius, thinking that he ment to fight againe : but vnderstanding that Besse had taken him then he gaue the THESSALIANS leaue to departe home into their contrie, and gauethen two thowsand talentes, ouer and about their ordinarie pay. Alexander had then a manue. lous long, hard, and painefull iorney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thowsande three hundred furlong, insomuch as the most parte of his men were even wearie, and done, for lacke of water. It chaunced him one day to meete with certaine Ma. CEDONIANS that caried (vppon moyles) goate skinnes full of water, which they had fee. ched from a river. They feeing Alexander in manner deade for thirst, being about noone ranne quickely to him, and in a headpeece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They answered him againe, that they caried it to their children but yet we would have your grace to live : for though we lofe them , we may get more chil. dren. When they had fayd fo, Alexander tooke the helinet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thrust out their neckesso looke voon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had genen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it. For, fayd he, if I drinke alone, all these men herewill faint. Then they feeing the noble corage and curtefie of Alexander, cried out that he should lead them: and therewithall beganne to fourre their horses, saying, that they were not weare nor a thirst, nor did thinke them selues mortall, so long as they had such a king. Euerieman was a like willing to followe Alexander, yet had he but three score only that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, paffinge ouer much golde and filuer which was scattered a broade in the market place, and going also by many charriottes full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the spurre vnil they had ouertaken the foremost that fled, thinking to have founde Darius amongest them. But at the length, with much a doe, they founde him layed along in a coche, having many woundes upon his bodie, some of darts and some speares. So, he being almost at the last cast. I called for some drinke, and dranke colde water, which Polystratus gaue him. To whom when he had dronke, he fayd: this is my last mishappe, my frend, that having received this pleasure. I can not requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the goddes, Alexander der, for the liberalitie and curtefie which he hath shewed vnto my wife and children, whom! The death of pray thee embrace for my fake. At these last wordes, he tooke Polystratus by the hande, and fo gaue up the goalt. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely shewed that he was sone for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he cast it vpon the body of Daring, After that, having by good happe gotten Bessus into his hands, he tare him in peces with two high straight trees which he bowed downewards, and tied his legges to eche of them: so that when the trees were let goe, they gaue a fodaine cruell ierke vp and caried either tree, a peece E of his bodie with it. Then Alexander having genen Darius corfe Princely buriall, and embalned him : he sent it vnto his mother, and received his brother Exathres for one of his frendes. From thence he went into the contric of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he sawe the gulfe of the sea Caspium, which he thought of no lesse greatnesse, then the sea of Pontes, howbeit calmer then the other seas be. He could not then certainly finde out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhoode he thought it was fome breakingout of the lake or marrish of Meotin. Yet some auncient naturall Philosophers seemed to know truely what it was . For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conquest, they wrote, that of the foure chiefest gulses of the sea that commeth from the Ocean, and doe entre within maine land, that which is most northerly, is the sea Caspium, which they call also Hyrca-P nium. As Alexander went through the contrie, certaine barbarous people fodainely fette vppon them that led Bucephal his horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, a thathe fent a Heraulde into their contrie to proclaime open warres uppon them, and that he would pur man, woman, and childe to the fword, if they brought him not his horse againe. Whereuppon, when his horse was returned home, and that they weelled up their vities and forces into his handes: he did vie them all very curteously, and moreover did generhem monew for the raunfome of his horfe, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the contrie of Part with. There havinge leafure enough, he beganne to apparell him felle after Mexender the facion of the barbarous people, bicause he thought thereby the bester to winne the harts goth alien of the contriemen, framing him felfe vinto their owne facions: or elfe to trye the harres of the Pri MACEDONIANS, to fee how they would like the maner of the Persians which he ment to fund bring them vnto') in reuerencing of him as they did their king, by litle and litle acquainting. them to allow the alteracion and chaunge of his life. This notwithflanding, he would not at thefirst take vothe apparell of the MEDES, which was verie straunge, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without briches, nor did weare a long gownetrailing on the grounder nora high coptanot hatte, but tooke a meane apparell betweet the MEDES & the REALENS. more modelt then theirs, and more costly than the last: and yet at the first he did not weare ir, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or else prinately amongest his frendes! and familliars. Afterwards not with standing, he showed him selfe openly to the people in that apparel, when he gaue them audience. This fight grieued the MACEDONIANS much!but they! Some faulter had his vertues in fuch admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take, at it be his owner pleasure. I thence he had bene often hurring the warren and no less that he bome this, in his owne pleasure, sithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his amon of great c legge broken with an arrow, and an other time, had fuch a blow with a stone full in his necked promet. that it made him spurre blinde a great while after, and yet neuerthelesse he neuer eschewed any bodely daunger. For he passed ouer the river of Orexartes, which he tooke to be Tanzis, Orexartess. and havinge in battell overthrowen the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase about a hundred furlong, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosenesse of bodie; Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONES, as many wryters doe tellifie: among the which are those, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onesicritus, Antigenes, and Hister, But Chares, Ptolomy, Anticlides, & Philon THEBAN, Philip the historiographer, Hecateus ERBTRIAN, Philip Chalcidian, and Duris Samian, all these doe wryte that it was not true : and it feemeth allo that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, wryting all things particularly vnto An-In thater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the king of Scythia offered him his daughter in mariage : but there he maketh no mencion at all of any AMAZONI It is also fayd, that Onesicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lysmachus, the fourth books of his historie, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus sinyling, sayd vnto him why, and where was I then ? But for that matter, to credit or not credit it, Alexanders estimacion thereby is neither impayred nor aduaunced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the Man CEDONIANS, being wearie with this long warre; would goe no further: he left all thereft of his armie behinde, and tooke only twentie thow fande footemen, and three thow fand horsemen of the choycest men of his armie, and with them inuaded the contrie of Hyricania There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of As i a had E but feene them as it were in a dreame, and if they should now returne backe into M AC & D'ON; having but onely sturred them, and not altogether subdued As tA: the people offended with Mexender them, woulde sette vppon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. of his month Neuertheleffe, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protesting therewith against broughs the them that would goe, how they did for fake him, his frends, and those who had so good harts Macedonians towards him, as to follow him in fo noble a iorney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the Ma-CEDONIANS. This felfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vinto Antipater: and there he wryteth furthermore, that having made this oration vnto them, they all cried out, and bad him leade them into what parte of the worlds he would. When they had graunted their good wills, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the rest of the common force who followed thexample of the chiefest. Thereuppon he did frame him selfe the more to liue after the facion of the contrie there, and enterchaungeable also to bring the men of that contrie vnto the manner of the MACED ONIANS: being perswaded, that by this mixture

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. 748 and enterchaunge of manners one with an other, he should by frendshippe more then force. A make them agree louingly together, when that he should be so farre from the contry of Paste. s IA. For this purpose therefore, he chose thirty thowsand of their children of that contry and fer them to learne the Greke tongue, and to be brought voin the discipling of warres, after the MACADONIANS maner : and gaue them schoolemasters and Captaines to traine them in ech facultie. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, feeing her at a feast where he was which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduite and counfell loued her. For the barbarous people were verie prowde of this matche when they fawe him make alliance with them in this force infomuch as they loued him better then they did before, bicause they law in those things he was alwayes so chast and continent, that notwithstanding he was manuelously in love with her, yet he would not dishonorably touche this young Ladie, before he R was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander confidering that of the two men which he loued best. Hephastion liked well of his matche, and went apparelled as him selfe did, and that Crateres Contrarily did still vie the MACEDONIAN manner: he delt in all affayres with the barbarous people, by Hephaltion, and with the GRECIANS and MACEDONIANS, by Craterus, To be (hort, he loued the one, and honored the other : faying, that Hephaltion loued Alexander. Quarell be- and Craterus loued the king. Hereuppon these two persons bare one an other grudge in their harts and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: infomuch as on a time being in IND 1A, they drewe their fwordes and fought together, and divers of their frendes ranne to take part with either fide. Thither came Alexander selfe also, who openly before them all, bitterly tookeyn Hephaltion, and called him foole and bedlem, faying: doeft thou not know, that what focuet he C be that should take Alexander from me, he should never live? Privatly also, he sharply rebuked Craterias, and calling them both before him, he made them frendes together, swearing by Isviter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men living, nevertheles if euer he founde that they fell out together againe, they should both dye for it, or him at the least that first beganne to quarrell. So ever after that, they say, there was never fowle word nor Why Phile- deede between them, not fo much as in sport only. There was also one Philosas, the sonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next vnto Alexander was the most valliantest man, the pacientest to abide paine, the liberallest, and one that loued his men & frends better then any noble man in the campe whatfoeuer. Of him it is reported that a frend of his came to him on a time to borrow money: and he commaunded straight one of D his men to let him haue it. His purse bearer aunswered him, that he had none. Why, faydhis master, doest thou tell me so: Hast thou not plate, and apparell to sell or gage to helpe him to fome? Howbeit otherwise, he had such a pride & glory to shew his riches, to apparell himselfe fo sumptuously, and to be more fine and princked then became a private man, that this made him to be hated:bicause he tooke vpo him to be a great man & to looke bigge on the matter, which became him ill fauoredly, and therfore every man through his owne folly fell in milliking with him. Infomuch as his owne father faid one day vnto him: sonne I pray thee be more humble & lowly. This Philotas had long before bene coplained vpon vnto Alexander, bicaule that when the cariage of king Darius armie (which was in the citie of DAMAS) was taken after the battell of CILICIA, among many prisoners that were taken and brought vnto Alexan-E ders campe, there was one Antigona, a passing fayer young curtifan, borne in the citie of Pip-NA. Philot as founde meanes to gette her, and like a young man that was in loue with her, making merie with her at the table, fondly lette fall braue wordes and boastes of a fouldier, faying, that what notable thinges were done, they were done by him felfe and his father : and called Alexander at euerie worde, young man, and fayd that by their meanes he helde his name and kingdome. This courtifan tolde one of his frendes what he fayd, and that frende tolde an other frende, and so went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the courtifan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom the told as much as the had fayd before. Alexander bad her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he fayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circum- F uented, did euer frequent her companie, and would be bold commonly to speake many soolish and vndiscreete words against the king, somtime in anger, & somtime againe in a brauery. Alexander

M. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philos 44. wethe diffembled it for that time, and would not be knowen of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affrayed of their great power and authoritie. About that time there was one Limnus Chalastrian a Maced on Innthat layed great and secret waite Limnus redto kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, entitled himsto helpe. Greketh to kill himsto doe this deede. The young man wifely denied it, & told the fame to his brother called Alexander. nations. He went vinto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they; had a matter of great importance to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let hills speake with:

the king (but why, no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hande. and was not at leasure. Then they went vnto an other, and he brought them wnto Alexanders Mintowhome first they opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him : and by the way they tolde alfo, how they had bene twife before with Philotas, who would not let their come in nor speake with them. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended ale fowhen Limnu was flaine by him, whome he fent to apprehende him, refifting him foutlies hewould not be taken : and thought that by his death he had loft a great meanes to dome to the light of this treason and conspiracie. Then Alexander frowning vppon Philothic phrought; all his enemies upon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they beganne to speake holdly, that it was time for the kinge to looke about him for it was notto be supposed that this Limnus Chalastrian of him selfe durst have entred into that treason; but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, secon by a greater personage then he : and sherefore C'that it floode Alexander vpon to examine them straightly, which had cause to be peshis treatfonfecret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto fuch wordes and vehement prefumptions.

there was straight brought in a thowsand accusations against Philosas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of divers Lordes and familliars of the king purto the torter. Alexander selfe being behinde a hanginge, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he hearde howe faintly and pitiefully he befought Hephaftion to take pitie of him, he fayd vnto him felfe: alas, poore Philotas, thou that halt fo faint a hart, howe durft thou take vppon thee fo great matters ? In fine, Philoras was put to death, and immediatly after he was Philoras and vppon thee to great matters an nne, romona was putto usating and numerical parties at the personal of the parties of the parti was his Lieutenaunt there, and one that had lerued king Philippe his father, in his greatest af-D favers, and who onely of all other the olde feruauntes of his father had procured Alexander totake in hande the conquest of Asia: and who also of three sonnes which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwardes was slaine him selfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his frendes affrayed of him, and specially Ann Antipater was npater : who secretly sent Ambassadors vnto the Erozrans, to make league with them, bi- firsted of cause they them selves also were affrayed of Alexander, for that they had put the Deniader to death. Alexander hearing that, fayd's that he him felfe, and nor the fonnes of the Orniades, would be reuenged of the ETOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitter, the which to heare it fimplie tolde, would feeme much more cruell than the death of Rhitein. But reportinge the cause and the time together in which it chaunced wit will be sounded E that it was not of fette purpose, but by chaunce, and vnfortunately, that Alexander being ouercome with wine; did valuckely wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his million. YVV hy Me-tune was this. There came certaine men of the lowe contries from the feafade, that brought ching. apples of GRECE anto Alexander. Alexander wondering to feethem fo greeno and fayers fent for Clitus to showe him them, and to gene him some of them. Clitus by channee did sacrifice at that time vnto the goddes, and left his facrifice to goe vnto Alexander : howebeit there were three weathers that followed him, on whome the accustomed sprincklinges had bene done alreadie to have facrificed them. Alexander understandinge that; tolde it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN, who both did aunswere him, that it was an ill figne. Alexander thereuppon gaue order straight, that they shoulde doe facrifice F for the health of Clitin, and speciallie for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that Mexanders he fawe Clitus in a mourninge gowne, fittinge amongest the sonnes of Parmenie, the which dreame of were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clieus did not make an ende of his facrifice, but a untill fuch time as he was able to crie no more, but lying on the ground, onely laie fighing.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. 750 came straight to supper to the kinge, who had that day facrificed vnto Castor and Polling A.A. this feast there was olde drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses song and made by a Poet, called Pranichus, (or as others fay, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people. and only to frame them, and to make the companie laugh. With these verses, auncient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grewe angrie with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that fong them. Alexander on thother side, and his familiars liked them verie well, and commaunded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being outer taken with wine, and befides of a churlish nature, provide and arrogant, fell into greater choles ler, and favd : what it was neither well nor honeftlie done in that force to speake ill of these poore Macho ONIAN Captaines (and speciallie amongest the barbarous people their captains mies) whichwere farre better men then they, that laughed them to scorne, although their fortune much worse then theirs. Mexander then replied, and sayd, that saying so, he please ded for him felfe i calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing up, fayd againe but vet this my cowardlynes faued thy life, that calleft thy felfe the forme of the goddes, when thou turnedicthy backe from Spithridates fword: and the blood which these poore Macano NTAN'S did fhedde for thee, and the woundes which they received of their bodies fighting for thee, have made thee fo great, that thou disdainest now to have king Philip for thy father and wilt needes make thy felfe the fonne of Impiter Hammon. Alexander being moved with shele The malapert- words, ftraight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these prowde words of thine, which thou vieft continually against me, making the MACEBONIAN'S rebell against C Alexander: Cliens aunswered againe, too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and

feruice to receive fuch reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long sence are dead and gone, not now to fee the MACEDONIANS foourged with roddes of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauor with the PBR SIANS, to have accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe aunswering and reuiling him : the grayest men fought to pacific this flurre and tumult. Alexander then turning him felfe vnto Xenodochus. CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN : doeyou not thinke (fayd he) that the GRECE A'NS are amongest the MACED ON LANS, as demy goddes that walke among brute beastes ? Clie twe for all this would not geue over his impudency and mallapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openlie what he had to say, or else not to bidde free men come to suppe D with him that were wont to speake franckely: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues than honored his PERSIAN girdell, and long white garment. Then coulde Alexander no longer hold his choller, buctooke an apple that was vpon his table, and threw it at Clitter, and looked for his fworde, the which Aristophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euerie man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly rose from the borde, and called his gard vinto him in the Man CEBONIAN tongue, (which was a figne of great trouble to followe after it) and commaunded a trompetor to found the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not found: whereuppon at lexander strake him with his fift. Notwithstanding, the trompetor was greatly commended afterwards, for that he only kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clinie, E whereupon his frends with much a doe thrust him out of the halle: but he came in againe at an other dore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearfed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedie:

Then Alexander taking a partifan from one of his gard, as Clittes was comming towardes him, and had life up the hanging before the dore, he ranne him through the body, so that Citi flue clium, & tus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choller had left him straight, and he became maruelous forowfull: and when he saw his frendes round about him fav neuer a word, he pluckt the partifan out of his body, & would have thrust it into his owne ? throte. Howbeithis gard about him caught him by the hands, & caried him perforce into his chamber: & there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, & the next day following,

His frendes hearing his voice no more; were afraid, and came into this chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them; fauring And ander the Soothefaver. who remembred him of his dreame he had of Class before, which was a prognoffication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his defteny herore he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander Asterwardes they brought in Callisherer the philosopher. akiniman of Ariffotles, and Anuxarchies borne in A BD BRA. Of thefe two Calliffrants fought Calliffrants by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensive to comfort Alexanders forow. But Anaxor and Anaxor thus that from the beginning had taken a way by him felle in the studie of philosophie, being for Alexanaccompted a braine ficke man, and one that despised his companions: he comming into Ale-R xunders chamber allo with him, cryed out arthe dore as he came in: Sec, yondor is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes apon, and is affraid of. Seewhere holies, weeping like a flaucon the ground that is affinid of the lawe, and of the reproche of men; as if he him felle: thould not geue them law, and stablish the boundes of justice or injustice; fithence he harb ouercome to be Lord and mafter, and not to be subject and flaue to a voine opinion, Knoweff thousant that the poets faie, that Imiter hath Themis, to wit, right and inflice placed of either hard on him? what fignifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is wholy right, and just? These wordes of Anakarchies did corafore the forowfull harre of king Alexander at that times bite therewithall, they made Alexanders maners afterwardes more fierce and diffoline. For as he thereby did marueloufly grow in fauor with the king, euen fo did he make the company of C Gallifthenes, (who of him felfe was not very pleafaunt, bicause of his granery and sowreness). much more hatefull and milliked then before. It is written also that there was certain ralke one night at king Alexanders borde touching the seasons of the yeare, & temperatenes of the ayer, and that Callifthenes was of their opinion which mainteined; that the contry they were inat that time was much colder, and the winter also tharper then in GRECE. Anawarehus. held the contrary opinion , and stilly mainteined it , in fo much as Callifthenes faid vinto him: and yet must thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there, all the winter time thou couldest goe with a fingle cloke on thy backe onely, and here thou must have three or foure garments vponthee when thou are at thy borde. This galled Anaxarchia to the quicke, and made him more angry then before: and for the other rethoritians and flatterers, they did alfo D hate him, bicause they saw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued also of oldemen for his honest life, the which was very grave, modest, and contented with his owne. defiring no mans els. Whereby men found, that the reason he alleaged for following of Ale. xander in this voyage, was true: for he faid that he came to be an humble futer to the king to reflore his banished divizens into their contrie againe; and to replenish their citie with inhabitantes. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuyed, yet did he him selfe gene The confe his enemies occasion to accuse him . For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper , ci- why callishether he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and fay nothing, showing by his week gravery and filence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alex xander selfe said on a time vnto him:

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, divers requesting him to make an oration on the fuddein in commendation of the MACEDONYAND he made fuch an eloquent oration your that matter, that all they that heard him rose from the border and clapping their handes for ioy, cast no segaves and sowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time faid vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides faid:

For w like a philosopher, he stowtely stood against kneeling to the king, and faid that openly, which the noblest & auncientest men among the Macedonians durst but whisper one in an other eare, though they did all vtterly millike it: whereby he did yet deliver GRECE from oren shame, & Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his person. This notwithstanding, he vadid him felfe bicause he would seeme rather by presumptioner bringe him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written the Alexander having dronke are certain feast where he hapned to be, reached his cuppe vitto one of his frendes, who after he had taken it of him, role up first on his feete, and dranke also turning him towardes the goddes, and first making folemne reuerence, he went and killed Alexander, and then fate him downe againe. All the reft that were at the feaft, did the like one? after an other, and Callifthenes also, who tooke the cuppe when it came to his turne, (the kine not looking on him, but talking with Hephalito,) after he had dronke, came to the king to kille him as others had done. How beit one Demetrius called Phido, faid vnto the king kiffe him not I pray your grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head a fide, and would not kiffe him . Then cryed Callifthenes out alowde: well, whe, then I will goe my waie, with leffe then others, by a kiffe. And thus beganne Alexanders grudge first a gainst Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephastion was credited the better, when he said that Callifthenes had promifed him to reverence Alexander, although that he had broken promife; After him also Lysmachus, Agnon, and diners others beganne to plaie their partes against him. faying, that this Sophister went bragging vp and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole we rannie, and that all the young men followed him to honor him, as if among fo many thowsand fouldiers, neuer a man of them had so noble a harte as he .. And therefore, when the treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discouered, they found the accusation probable; the which some falle detracters had informed against Callifthenes: who had aunswered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be famous about all men, thus: in killing the famousest person. that country: who beeing mercenary fouldiers, were euer enterteyned in service of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in divers places, Alexander having made peace with them in a citie where they were kept in : when they came abrode apon suertie of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sworde. There was but this onely fault, to bleamish the honor of his noble deedes in all his warres: for in all thinges els, he shewed mercy and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philosophers and wise men of India did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kinges and Princes of the Indians for that they yelded vnto Alexander, & procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke divers of their E cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his actes at large which he did against him. For he fayth, that both their campes lying on either side of the river of Hydaspes, king Porus fet his Elephants apon the banke of the river with their heades towards their enemies, to keepe them from passing ouer: and that he him selfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be afraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, & the choice of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Ilande. When he was come into the Iland, there fel a wonderful shower of raine, great windes, lightnings and thunders apon his campe, infomuch as he faw many of his men burnt by lightning. in this litle llande. This notwithstanding, he did not leave to get over to the other side of the F riuer. The riuer being swollen with the great flud of rayne that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: fo that Alexander when he

that he could hardly keepe his feete, bicause the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rape of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on every fide. It is written of him, that then he fayd vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take fuch paines, and put my felfe into fo many daungers, onely to be praifed of you? Thus Oneficeritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of tymber pinned together whereuppon they had passed ouer the streame of the mayne riner: and that hey waded thorow the other arme or gutt of the water which had broken the earth, uppe to their breafts with their harnesse on their backes. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters he rode with his horsemen twenty furlonges before the battell of his footemen: thin-R king that if his enemies came to give him charge with their men of armes, that he was the fronger: and if they would also aduawnce their footemen forwarde, that his footemen also thould come tyme enough. One of the twaine fel out as he had geffed. For a thowfand horsemen, and three skore charrets armed with his ennemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, & flue foure hundred of the men of armes in the fielde. King Porus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the river: he marched towardes him with all his armie in battell ray, fauing a few which he left behinde to refift the MACEDONIANS, if they shewed force to palle over the river. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his ennemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not give charge apon the middest of the battell, but being him selfe C in the left winge, gaue charge apon the corner of thenemies left winge, and also commaunded them that were in the right winge to doe the like. So, both the endes of thenemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne vnto the Elephants, & gathered them felues together about them. Thus the battell being begon, the conflict continued long, infomuch as the enemies were scantly all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Many writers doe agree, that Porus was foure cubits and a shaft length hier and bigger then The statute of the Elephant, although the Elephant was very great, and as bigge as a horse: and besides that king Porus. the Elephant did shew great wit and care, to saue the king his Maister. For whilest he perceyued his Maister was stronge enough, he lustily repulsed those which came to assayle him: but of the Elephia when he found that he began to faint, having many woundes apon his body, and arrowes stic- to save the D king in it: then being afraid left his Maister should fall downe from his backe, he softely fell on her his main his knees, and gently taking his dartes and arrowes with his troncke, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after an other. Porus beeing taken, Alexander asked him, howehe should handle him, princely, aunswered Porus. Alexander asked him agayne, if he would faye any thing els. I comprehend all, fayde he, in this word princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leave him his prouinces and Realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieferenant: but gaue him many other contries also. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke that fo aftonied him, that he leaned against the wall looking apon his enemies. In the meane time, the MACEDONIANS compaffing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a fownde, and was past knowledge: Whereupon, there ranne a rumor straightin the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a doe to cut the arrow afonder that was of wodde: fo his curats being plucked of with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his body, which stucke in one of his bones: the which as it is reported, was source F fingers long, and three fingers broad. He comaunded his ships should fetch a copale about, & leane In Dra on the right hand: & made Nearebus Admirall of all his fleete, & Ones. critico chiefe Pilote. He him felf in the meane time went by land through the contry of the Q. RLTE's, & there he found great scarsinge of vittels, & lost many of his ments that he caried no out of INDIA the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in align score thowsand footemen. & fifteen thowsand horsmen. Some of the died of greenous differfes, others, by ill diet, others, by extreme heat & drowght, & the most of the by hunger, transit ling through this barren contry, where the poore men lined hardly, & had onely a few sheepe which they fed with fea fifth, that made their flesh sauor very il sauoredly. At the legth, when is three score daies iorney he had painfully trauelled through this contry, he the entred into the cotry called GEDROSIA, where he found great plery of al kind of vittels, which the gouernous kings, & princes, neighbours vnto the same, did sed vnto him. After he had refreshed his army The contry of there a little, he wet through the cotry of CARMANIA, where he continued feue daies together banketing going feil through the contry. For night & day, he was feathing continually within frends apon a scaffold loger then broad, rising vp of height, & drawn with eight goodly horse After that feaffold followed divers other charrets covered over, some with goodly rich arts. & nurple filk, others with trim fresh boughes which they renued at euery fields end: & in those were Alexanders other frends & captaines with garlands of flowers apon their heades, which drank & made mery together. In all this armie, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor target feene: but gold & filuer bowles, cups, & flagons in the fouldiers hands, al the way as they went drawing wine out of great pipes severfiels which they caried with them, one drinking to ano ther, some marching in the fields going forward, & cothers also set at the table. About the were the minstrels playing & piping on their states & shalmes, & wome singing & daunting, & soo ling by the way as they wet. In all this diffolute marching through the cotry, & in the middel of their dronkenes, they mingled with it sport that every madid strive to courterfeat all the infolecies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus him felt had ben there in person, & had led the mommer. Whe he came vnto the kings castel of GEDROS IA, he staied there also certein daies to resiell his army with feafting & baketing. It is faid, that one day whe he had dronke hard, he went in fee the games for daunting: & amongst the, the games which a yong man called Bagoon hadden forth, (with who Alexander fel in liking) & bare the bel. This Bagoas being in his daunting gan mets, came through the Theater, & fat him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIAN SWETCH glad of it, that they showted & clapped their hands for iov, crying out alowde, to kiffe him: 50 that in fine he toke him in his armes, & killed him, before them all. Thither came Nearchin his Admiral vnto him: who made report what he had sene & done in his nauigatio. Alexander was fo glad of that, as he was defirous to faile by fea him felf. & fo, entring into the fea oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great flecte of ships, to copasse in all the coasts of Arabia& A FRICKE, & thece into Mare Mediterranen, by the straights of the pillers of Hercules, To this E inter he built a great nuber of thips in the city of THAP'S AC VS, & fent for mariners, thipmafters, & pilots, our of al parts. But now, the difficultie of the iorney which he tooke apon him for the coquest of India, the daunger he was in whe he fought with the MALLIANS, & the nuber of his me which he loft befides which was very great, al these things cofidered together, making me beleuethauhe (hould neuer return with fafetie:they made all the people(which he had con quered) bold to rife against him, & gaue his governors & Lieuetenants of provinces occasion to comit great infolecies, tobberies, & exactios of people. To be short, it put al his kingdomini broile & fedition: Infomuch as Olympias & Cleopatra rifing against Autipater, they decided his gouernmet between the: Olympias choling for her the kingdo of Epinvs: & Cleopatra, the kingdo of Macenon. Which whe Alexander had heard, he laid his mother was the wifelt for the ! realme of Macan on would never have suffred a woma to raigne over the. Therupon he sent Wearchine back again to the sea determining to fil all the sea coasts with warre. As he transled

A through the cotries farre fro the feashe put his capteines & gouernors to death, which had renolted against him: & of those heslue Oxyarthes, one of Abulites sonnes, by his own had roning him thorow with a pike. And whe Abulites felf also had brought Alexader iii thowsad talets only, without any other prouision made for vittels for his army: he made him put the money before his horse, which would not once touch it. Then sayd he vnto him: I pray thee to what purpose ferueth this prouisio? & therwithal immediatly comitted him to priso. As he came through the CORTY Of PERSIA, he first renued the old custo there, which was: that as often times as the kings didreturn home fro any far iorney, they gaue vnto euery woma a crown a peece. It is faid therfore that for this cause, some of their natural kings many times did not returne again into their conv: & that Oshus amogst others did not so much as once returne back again, willingly banisaught the dif well trained & ready in armes: Alexander reloyced when he faw them. This notwithstanding cipline of mars did much discorage the MACEDONIANS, & made them greatly affraid, bicause they though that from thenceforth the king would make leffe accompt of the For when Alexander would haue fent the ficke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low contry, to the fea fide: they aunswered him, that so doing he should do them great wronge, m fend these poore men fro him in that fort, after they had done him all the service they could home to their contry & frends, in worse case then he tooke them from thence. And therefore they faid, if he would fend away fome, let him fend them all away as men vnferuiceable, specially fithence he had now fuch goodly yong daunfers about him, with whom he might go con-R quer the world. Alexander was maruelously offended with their prowd words, insomuch the in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary gard, & tooke other Persians in their place, making some the gard about his owne person, others, his vishers, heraulds, & ministers to execute his will and commaundement. The poore MACEDONIANS feeing Alexander this waited on & them selues so shamefully rejected: they let fall their stoutnes, and after they had comoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare the felues for spite & malice. In fine whethey had laid their heads together, they colented to go vnto his tent & without weapos. naked in their shirts to yeld theselues vnto him, weping & howling, beseching him to do with the what pleased him, & o vse the like wretched vnthankful creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somwhat pacified, did not receive the the first time, neither did they also go (their waies, but remained there 2 daies & nights together, in this pitiful state, before the dore of histent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their foueraine & king: vntill that he came him felf out of his tent the third day, & seing the poore wretches in this greeuous & pitiful state, he him self sel a weeping a long time. So, after he had a little rebuked the, he called the curteoully, & gaue the impoter & fick persons leaue to depart home, rewarding the very honorably. Furthermore, he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should alwaies give the the highest place in al comon sports & affemblies, & that they should be crowned with garlands of flow ers. Moreouer, he comanded that the orphans whose parents were slaine in the warrs, should receive the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the citie of ECBATANA, in the kingdő of M EDE A, & that he had dispatched his waightiest causes: he gaue him self again vno D publike sportes, feasts, & pastimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of GR & CEA. thowsand excellent masters & deuisers of such sports. About that time it chauced, that Hephe flion fell ficke of an agew. But he beeing a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth ashe should have done, but having spyed oportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports & passimes: He went to dinner, and cate a roasted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereuppon his seutr tooke him so sorely, that he lived not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chaunce of his death, & comanded all the heares of his horse & mules to be presently shorn in toke of mourning, & that al the battlemets of the wals of cities should also be ouerthrown, & hong vp pore Glaucus his Philitian vpon a crofle, & comanded that no minstrel should be heard play of any E kind of instrument within his campe: vntil that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, comaiding that Hephaftion should be worshipped & facrificed vnto, as a demy god. In thend, to passe ouer his mourning and sorow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, and there fubdued the people of the Coss EIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and flue man, woman, and childe. And this was called the facrifice of Hephaltions funeralls, Alexander furthermore beeing desirous to bestowe tenne thowsand talents coste vppon his obsequies and funeralls, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenes and excellencie of workemanshippe: amongest all other excellent workemasters, he desired one Stasicrates, for he had euer passing invention, and his worke was alwayes stately and sumptuous in any newe Staffcrates an thinges he tooke in hande. For he talking one daye with Alexander, tolde him, that of all F the Mountaynes he knewe in the worlde, he thought there was none more excellent to refemble the statue or image of a man, then was Mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were

A his pleasure, he would make him the noblest and most durable image, that should bee in the world, which in his left hand should hold a citie to conteine ten thowsand persons, and out of his right hand, there should ronne a great river into the sea. Yet Alexander would not harken rohim, but then was talking with other workemen of more straunge inuentions, & farre grearercost. Now as he was ready to take his iorney to go vnto BABYLON: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the river of Euphrates, and tolde him. how certaine CHALDEAN Soothfayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he should not goe into BABY LON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the walls of BABYLON, he faw a great number of crowes fighting & killing one of another, & fome of them fell downe deade hard by him. Afterwards being told him that A-R pollodorus the gouernor of the citie of BABYLON, having facrificed vnto the goddes, to knowe what should happen to him: he sent for the Soothsayer Pithagoras, to knowe of him if it were mue. The Soothfayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what fignes he had in the facrifice. He aunswered, that the lyuer of the beast had no head. O gods, said Alexander then, this is anill figne: notwithstanding he did Pithagor as no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not heleue Nearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroade in the contry from BABYLON, & did take his pleafure rowing up & downe the river of Euphrates. Yet had Divers signed he many other ill signes & tokes one vpo another, that made him afraid. For there was a tame before Alexaffe that killed one of the greatest & goodliest Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feete. Another time when Alexander had put of his clothes, to be nointed to play at tennis: When he c should put on his apparel again, the yong gentlemen that plaied with him, found a man set in his chaier of estate, having the kings diademe on his head, & his gowne on his back, & said neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them aunswer, but at the length comming to him felf, he faid his name was Diony lius, borne in MESSINA: & being accused for certein crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thether, where he had bene a long time prisoner, & also that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, & vndone his irons, & that he commaunded him to take the kings gowne & his diademe, and to fit him downe in his chaier of estate, & say neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counfail of his Soothfayers: but then his mind was troubled, & feared that the gods had for saken him, & also grew to suspect his frends. But first of al, Alexander seared Antipater & his Alexander

D fonnes, aboue all other. For one of them called tolas, was his first cupbearer: & his brother cal-ferred Antiled Cassander, was newly come out of GRECE vnto him. The first time that Cassander faw fome of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he having bene brought vp with the libertie of GRECE, & had never feene the like before: fel into a lowd laughing very vnreueretly. Therwith king Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the heare of his head with both his hands. & knocked his head & the wal together. Another time also when Cassander did aunswer fomethat accused his father Antipater:king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, & said vnto him. What faiest thou, said he? Doost thou thinke that these men would have gon so long a iorney as this, fallly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Cassander again replyed vnto Alexander, & faid, that that was a manifest proofe of their false accusatio, for that they did now

E accuse him being so farre of bicause they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fel a laughing a good, & faid, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & cotra: but this wil not faue you from punishment, if I find that you have done these men wronge. In fine, they report that Caffander tooke fuch an inward feare & conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GRECE at his commaundement: going vp and downe the citie of Delphes, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into fuch a fodaine feare, that the heares of his head floode vpright, and his body quaked in fuch fort, that it was a greattime before he could come to him felfe againe. Nowe after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the goddes, his minde was fo troubled and affraide, that no straunge thinge happened vnto him,

F (how litle fo euer it was) but he tooke it straight for a figne and prediction from the godds: fo that his tent was alwayes full of Priestes and Soothsayers that did nothing but sacrifice and purifie, and tende vnto divinements. So horrible a thing, is the mistrust and contempt of the

that he had received some aunswers touching Hephastion from the oracle of Jupiter Han, mon he left his forow, and returned again to his bankets and feafting. For he did fumptuoufly feaf Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bathe according to his manner, beeing ready to goe to bed, Medius one of his Capteines befought him to come to a banket to him at his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, so thathe Alexander got an agew by it. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had such an extreame seuer and thirst withall, thathe dranke wine, & after that fel a rauing, & arthe legth dyed the thirtie day of the month of lune. In his houshold booke of things passed dayly, it is written, that his feuer beeing apon him he flept in his hottehouse on the eyghtenth day of June. The next morning after he was come out of his hottehouse, he went into his chamber, and passed away all that daye with Me. diss. playing at dyce: and at nyght very late, after he had bathed him felfe and facrificed vn-

in the great sea Oceanum. The one and twenty day also having done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, & felt him felfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feuer: and on that day he made his bed to be removed, and to be fet vppeby the fifth pondes, where he commoned with his capteines touching certaine roomes that were void in his armie, and commaunded them not to place any men that were not of good experience. The three and twenty day having an extreame feuer vpon him, he was caried vnto the facrifices, and commaunded that his chiefest Capteines onely should remaine in his lodging. and that the other meaner fort, as centiniers or Lieuetenants of bands, that they should watch & ward without. The foure and twenty day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on thother fide of the lake, where he flept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: & when D his Capteines & noble men came to doe him humble reuerence, & to fee him, he lay speechles. So did he the fine and twenty day also: infomuch as the MACED ONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came & knocked at the pallace gate, & cried out vnto his friendes and familiers, and threatned them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereuppon the gates were opened, & they comming in their gownes went vnto his bed fide to fee him. That felfe day Python & Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to knowe if they should bringe king Alexander thither. The god aunswered them, that they should not remoue him from thence. The eight and twenty day at night Alexander dyed. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the houshold booke of remembrance. At that present tyme, there was no suspition that he was poyloned. Yet they say, that six yeares after, E there appeared some proofe that he was poisoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was faid he gaue him poyfon in his drinke. They that thinke it was Ariftotle that counfelled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poyson was brought: they say that Agnothemis reported it, of Alexander. nauing heard it of king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyfon (as fome fay) was cold as Ife, and falleth from a rocke in the territory of the citie of Nonacris, & it is gathered as they would gather a deawe into the horne of the foote of an affe, for there is no other kinde of thinge that wil keepeit, it is so extreme cold & percing. Others defend it, & say, that the report of his poyfoning is vntrue: & for proofe therof they alleage this reason, which is of no smal importance, that is: That the chiefest Capteines fel at great variance after his death, so that the corps of A-F lexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a whot dry contry, & yet there never appeared any figne or token apon his body, that he was poyloned, but was still a cleane and

But when the was come, Roxane killed her and her fifter, and then threw their bodies into a Stating Stating well, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdice as helpe and confent, Perdice as came to be king, immediatly after Alexanders death, by meanes of Aridaus, whom he kept about him for his gard and fafety. T what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would have had Cafar put Cafar igyned away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator : but when he Marine. faw, he could neither with any promife northreate bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cause of Casars ill willvnto Sylla, was by meanes of mariage: for Marius thelder, maried his fathers own fifter, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Cafar & he were cosin germaines. Sylla being troubled in waightic matters, putting to death so many of his enemies, when he came to be coqueror, he made no reckoning of Cafar: but he was not contented to be hidden in fafety, but came and made fute vnto the people for the Priesthoodshippe that was voyde, when he had feant any heare on his face. Howbeit he was repulfed by Syllaes meanes, that fecretly was against him, Who, when he was determined to have killed him, some of his frendes told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not consider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Cafar vinderstanding F that, stale out of Rome, and hidde him selfe a long time in the contrie of the Sabines wandring still from place to place. After he had escaped them thus, he went vnto the sea side, and tooke shippe, and failed into BITHYNIA to goe unto king Nicomedes. When he had bene with him a while he to fleepe, he fent vnto them to commaunde them to make no noyfe. Thus was he eight and R out of the hauen of MILETVM, to follow those theeues, whom he found yet riding at ancher (pray him to come home againe. But he failed first vnto RHODES, to studie there a time vnder D Apollonius the sonne of Molon, whose scholler also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man. & well before the people, & befides that rare gift, he was excellently well studied, so that doutthe degree of perfection to speake well, which his nature coulde have performed in him, bicause he was genen rather to followe warres and to mannage great matters, which in thende brought him to be Lord of all Rome. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the readers not to compare the stile of a souldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most parte of his life. E When he was returned againe vnto Rome, he accused Dolabella for his ill behauior in the gouernment of his province, and he had divers cities of GRECE that gave in evidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cafar, to requite the good will of the GRECIANS, which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of Ma-CEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driven to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he coulde have no inflice in GR ECE against the GRECIANS. Now Casar immediatly wan many mens good willes at Rome, through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes: and the people loued him maruelously also, bicause of the curteous manner he had to speake to enery man, and F to vie them gently, being more ceremonious therein, then was looked for in one of his yeres. Furthermore, he euer kept a good bourde, and fared well at his table, and was very liberal

tooke sea againe, and was taken by pyrates about the Ile of Pharmac vsa: for those pyrates kept all vppon that fea coast, with a great fleete of shippes and botes. They asking him at the first twentie talentes for his ransome, Casar laughed them to scorne, as though they knew nor what a man they had taken, & of him felfe promifed them fiftie talents. Then he fent his men vp and downe to get him this money, so that he was left in maner alone among these theenes of the CILICIANS, (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his frends, and two of his flaues only: and yet he made fo litle reckoning of them, that when he was defirous thirtie dayes among them, not kept as prisoner, but rather waited uppon by them as a Prince. All this time he woulde boldly exercise him selfe in any sporte or pastime they would goeto. And other while also he woulde wryte verses, and make orations, and call them together to fay them before them: and if any of them feemed as though they had not vnderstoode him, or passed not for them, he called them blockeheades, and brute beastes, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merie with the matter as could be, and tooke all in good parte, thinking that this his bold speach came, through the simplicity of his youth. So when his raunsome was come from the citie of MILETVM, they being payed their money, and he againe fet at libertie: he then prefently armed, and manned out certaine ships in the same Iland. So he tooke the most of them, & had the spoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMVM, & there committed the to prison, whilest he him selfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the gouernment of As 1A, 25 vnto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that contrie. But this Prætor having a great fancie to be fingering of the money, bicause there was good store of it : anfivered, that he would confider of these prisoners at better leasure. Casar leaving Junius there. returned againe vnto Pergamym, and there hung vp all these theeues openly vpon a crosse, as he had oftentimes promised them in the Ile he would doe, when they thought he didbut ieast. Afterwardes when Syllaes power beganne to decay, Casars frendes wrote vnto him, to an excellent good Rethoritian. It is reported that Cafar had an excellent naturall gift to speake leffe he was counted the fecond man for eloquence in his time, and gaue place to the first bicause he would be the first and chiefest man of warre and authoritie, being not yet comen to IVLIVS CAESAR.

A befides: the which in deede did aduaunce him forward, and brought him in estimacion with cases a fide the people. His enemies judging that this fauor of the common people would foone quaile, lower of the when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence : suffered him to runne on, till by lide and litle he was growen to be of great strength & power. But in fine, when they had thus geuen him the bridell to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though in dede in fight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and common wealth of Rome: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuaunce of time will foone make it ftrong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnes. Thereuppon, Cicero like a wife shipmaster that feareth the calmnes of the fea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the common R wealth, found out his craft & malice, which he cunningly cloked vnder the habit of outward curtefie and familliaritie. And yet, fayd he, when I confider howe finely he combeth his faire Ciceroei bulh of heare, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scrat his head with one finger only: "of Casar.

my minde gives me then, that fuch a kinde of man should not have so wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. But this was long time after that. The first shewe and proofe of the love and good will which the people did beare vnto Cafar, was: The love of when he fued to be Tribune of the fouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thowfand footemen) stand- the people in ding against Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the se-

For being her nephew, he made a folemne oration in the market place in com-C mendacion of her, and at her buriall did boldly venter to shew foorth the images of Marius: Casar made the which was the first time that they were seene after Syllaes victorie, bicause that Marius and the same all all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the common wealth. For death of his when there were some that cried out apon Casar for doing of it: the people on thother side auns Iulia, kept a sturre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their handes, and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembraunce of Marius honor againe into Rome, which had so long time bene obscured & buried. And where it had bene an auncient custom of long casar the strill time, that the ROMANES vsed to make funerall orations in praise of olde Ladies and matrons that praised when they dyed, but not of young women: Cefar was the first that praised his owne wife with nerall oraison. funerall oration when she was deade, the which also did increase the peoples good willes the

After the buriall of his wife, he was made Trea- cafe made forer, vnder Antistius Vetus Prætor, whom he honored euer after: so that when him selfe came Quassion. tobe Prætor, he made his sonne to be chosen Treasorer. Afterwardes, when he was come out of that office, he maried his thirde wife Pompeia, having a daughter by his first wife Cornelia, Pompeia, Cawhich was maried vnto Pompey the great. Now for that he was very liberal in expences, bying farithind (as some thought) but a vaine and short glorie of the fauor of the people: (where in deede he bought good cheape the greatest thinges that coulde be.) Some say, that before he bare any office in the common wealth, he was growen in debt, to the summe of thirteene hundred talentes. Furthermore, bicause he was made ouerseer of the worke, for the high way going vnto Appins; he disbursed a great summe of his owne money towardes the charges of the same.

E And on the other fide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did show the people the pastime of three hundred & twentie cople of fword players, and did befides exceede all other in fumptuousnes in the sportes and common feastes which he made to delight them withall: (and did as it were drowne all the stately shewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so cafars prodict pleased the people, & wan their loue therwith, that they denised daily to give him new offices galing.

for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in Rome, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power, & the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote & durst not shew it selfe. But Cafar, bicause he would renue it again, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feasts and common sports were in their greatest russe: he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphes, and those he set vp one of him that durst fet them up there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereuppon, it range A Cafar accused straight through all the citie, and euerie man came thither to fee them. Then some cried on to make a rebellion in the apon Cefer, and fayd it was a tyranny which he ment to fet up, by renuing of fuch honorsas before had bene troden vnder foote, and forgotten, by common decree and open proclama tion: and that it was no more but a baite to gage the peoples good wils, which he had fet our in the stately shewes of his comon playes, to see if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide fuch partes to be played, and a new alteracion of things to be made. They of Me. rius faction on thother side, incoraging one an other, shewed them selves straight a great niber gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of handes: infomuch as the teares ranne downe many of their cheekes for very joy. when they sawe the images of Marius, and they extolled Casar to the skies, judging him the R worthiest man of all the kinred of Marius. The Senate being affembled thereuppon, Catalan Luctatius one of the greatest authoritie at that time in Rome, rose, and vehemently inueved against Casar, and spake that then which ever since hath bene noted much: that Casar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plaine force fought to alter the state of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, Casar at that time aunswered him so that the Senate was satisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimacion did grow in better hope then before, & perswaded him, that hardily he should geue place to no man, and that through the good will of the people, he should be better than all they, and come to be the chiefest man of the citie. At that time, the The death of chiefe Bishoppe Metellus dyed, and two of the notablest men of the citie, and of greatest anthoritie (I fauricus, and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cafar notwithstanding their conten-C. chiefe Bishop of Rome. tion, would geue neither of them both place, but presented him selfe to the people, and made fute for it as they did. The fute being equall betwext either of them, Catulus, bicause he was a man of greater calling and dignitie than the other, doubting the vncertaintie of the election: fent vnto Casar a good summe of money, to make him leave of his sute. But Casar sent him word againe, that he would lend a greater fumme then that, to maintaine the fute against him, When the day of thelection came, his mother bringing him to the dore of his house, celer weeping, kiffed her, and fayd: Mother, this day thou shalt see thy sonne chiefe Bishoppe of Rome, or banished from Rome. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated: Casar wanne the victorie, and made the Senate and noble chiefe Bifliop men all affrayed of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the people do D what he thought good. Then Catulus and Pifo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him. Ged to be co. for that he did not bewray Cafar, when he knew that he was of conspiracie with Catiline, and had oportunitie to have done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth, but veterly to destroy the Empire of Rome, he scaped out of the handes of iustice for lacke of sufficient proofe, before his full treason and determination was knowen. Notwithstanding he lest Lentulus and Cethegus in the citie, companions of his conspiracie: vnto whom, whether Casar did geue any secret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowen. Yet this is manifest, that when they were continued in open Senate, Cite-10 being at that time Conful, asking every mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should have, and every one of them till it came to Cafar, gave sentence they should dye: Cafar E Cefar nem 4- then rising up to speake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and sayd, that it the configuration was neither lawefull, nor yet their custome did beare it, to put men of such nobilitie to death (but in an extremitie) without lawefull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in prison in some citie of ITALIE, where Cicero thought best, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowen: the Senate then might at their pleasure quietly take such order therein, as might best appeare vnto their wisedoms. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with such a passing good grace and eloquence, that not only they which were to speake after him did approue it : but such also as had spoken to the contrarie before, reuoked their opinion and stucke to his, vntil it came to Cato and Catulus to speake. They both did sharpely inuey against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Casar suspected to F be of the conspiracie, and stowtly spake against him, insomuch that the offenders were put in-

A of young men which garded Cicero for the fafetie of his person, did fette apon him with theib wordes drawen. But forme fay, that Curio couered Cafar with his gowney and tooke him and of their handes. And Civere felfe, when the young men looked apon him, backened with his headthat they hould not kil him, either fearing the fury of the people, or electron blothoughs imogshamefull and wicked a parte. But if that were true, I maruell why Ciarodid nobputing into his booke he wrote of his Confulthippe. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for thathe tooke not the oportunitie offered himagainst Cafar, onely for outermuch feare of the headle, that loued him verie dearely. For thortly after, when Cafar went into the Senate; to deere him felfe of certaine prefumptions and falle acculations objected against him and bea ing bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him lenger then the weer to work: the Recoble came about the counsell house, and called out allower for him, bidding them let him ant trate then fearing the infurrection of the poore needle persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cefar, and did also mone the people to stucce: did per swadenhe demande distinguished make a franke distribucion of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribucion did plut the common wealth to a new charge of five hundred & fiftie Myriades. This etanfell quenched apresent great feare, and did in happie time scatter and disperse abroade the bolk parts of Ces far force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect the his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he never fought any alteration in the common wealth, but contrarily he him felfe had a great misfortune fell with wow it house which was this. There was a young nobleman of the order of the Paraterans, called Bublish Ochdisse, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwise as infolent and impudences Berfon, as any was elfe in ROME. He became in loue with Pompeia Cafars wife, who milliked The lane of portion, as any was entern nome. He occament tothe with rempeta Cafari and what have not with all a not with flanding the was to straightly looked to, and that Aurelia (Cafaris mother) 20, children on Pomian honest gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two louers could not meete as they pola, tashing would, without great perill and difficultie. The ROMANES doenfe to honora goddeffe which wife goodged. they call the good goddeffe, as the GRECIANS have her whom they call Comments to wit, the deliberted goddefle of women. The GRECIANS, they fay also, that the was one of the mother tof the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on hier field davethe won D men make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, and leaves of vine branches; and allothese make as the tale goeth, a holie dragon for this goddeffe, and doe ferit by hear belides it is not lawful for any man to be prefent at their facrifices, no norwichin the houle it fulle where their are made. Furthermore, they fay that the women in the fo facrifices do many things among the the felues, much like voto the ceremonies of Orphemi. Now when the time of this feath change the husband, (whether he were Przetor or Conful) and all his men & the boyers in the homes doccome out of it, and leave it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasured for there the facrifices and ceremonies are done the most parte of the night, and they live belides passe the night away, in fonges and musicke: Pompeia, Cafars wife, being that peared dosclebrate this feath. Thus Cloding being found out, wen of the women a they thrust him out of the dores by the shoulders. The same nighting women tolde their husbandes of this chaunce as soone as they came home. The nextune ning, there ranne a great rumor through the citie, how Glodius had attempted a great william and that he descrued not only to be punished of them whom he had slaunds ed, but also offer common wealth and the goddes. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that diding him. & accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefel of the nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burdened him with man horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne fister, which was maried vnso Lucillus. Notwithstanding, the people stowtly defended Clodius against their acculations; and this did helpe him much against the Judges, which were amazed, & affini so firre the people. This notwithstanding, Cafar presently put his wife away, and thereuping being brought by Clodins accuser to be a witnes against him, he aunswered, he knew nothing of that they objected against Clodius. This aunswere being cleane contrarie to their expense cion that heard it. the accuser asked Cafar, why then he had put away his wife: bicause I will not, fayd he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cafar spake trucks he thought. But others thinke that he did it to please the common people, who were very defirous to fauo Clodina. So Clodina was discharged of this accusation, bicause the most parted the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the seare they stoode one way of the daungers the common people if they condemned him; and for the ill opinion of thother fide of the no-0 the common people is they condemned infinitely the policy of the province of Spayne being fallen with critical fitters, if they did quit him. Cafar being vnable to fatisfie them, was compelled to goe vnto Crist. fine who was the richest man of all Rome, and that stoode in neede of Cafars boldnes and to craffu firety rage to withfland Pompeys greatnes in the common wealth. Craffus became his furctie vinohis greediest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirtie talentes : whereupponther fuffered Cefanto departe to the government of his province. In his iorney it is reported, that passinge ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a little poore village that had not many householdes, and yet poore cotages. There, his frendes that did accompanie him; asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there I were any fittie there amongest the noblemen for honor. Cafar speaking in good earnest anne fwered: I can not tell that faid he but for my parte, I had rather be the chiefest man hereuther the fecond person in Rome. An other time also when he was in Spayne, reading the history of Alexanders actes, when he had red it, he was forowfull a good while after & then burfling in weeping. His frends feeing that, manueled what should be the cause of his sorow. He auni fwered them doese not thinke layd he, that I have good cause to be heavie, when king alo stander being no older than my felfe is now, had in old time wonne fo many nations and contries; and that I hithervnto have done nothing worthy of my felfe? Therefore when he was come into Sparrie the was very carefull of his busines, and had in few dayes joyned tenner enlignes more of footemen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marchinesis !! ward against the Call's Clans and Lyair anians, he conquered all, &went as faire as the great fea Oceanium of bubduing all the people which before knew nor the ROMANBS for their Lordes. There he tooke order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wifely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them frendes one with an other but specially he pacified all futes of law & strife, between the detters and credis tors, which grewe by reason of vierie. For he ordained that the creditors shoulde take yearsh two partes of the renemie of their detters, vntill fuch time as they had payed them felues and that the detters should have the third parte to them selves to live withall. He having would great estimacion by this good order taken, returned from his government very riche, and his fouldiers also full of rich spoyles, who called him Imperator, to say soueraine Captaine: Now I she Ro want a having a custome, that such as demaunded honor of triumphe, should remain a while without the eins, and that they on thother fide which fued for the Confulthip, thould

A of necessitie be there in person : Cafar comming vnhappely at that very time when the Confuls were chosen, he sent to pray the Senate to do him that sauor, that being absent, he might by his frendes fue for the Confulfhippe, Cato at the first did vehemently inuey against it vowching an expresse law forbidding the contrarie. But afterwards, perceining that not withstanding the reasons he alleaged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Casar) favored his request: yet he cunningly sought all he could to prevent them, prolonging time; dilating his oration vntill night. Cafar thereupon determined rather to gene over the fute of his triumphe. and to make fute for the Confulthippe: and so came into the citie, and had such a denise with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato only. His deuise was this, Fompey and Crassing, two of Cafareconthe greatest personages of the city of Rome, being at iarre together, Casar made them frends, per and Craft B and by that meanes got vnto him felfe the power of them both : for, by colour of that gentle fin together. acte and frendshippe of his, he subtilly (vnwares to them all) did greatly alter and chaunge the state of the common wealth. For it was not the private discord betwene Pompey and Cafar, as many men thought, that caused the civil warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers first to ouerthrowe the state of the Senate and nobilitie, and afterwardes they fell at larre one with an other. But Cato, that then foresaw and prophecied many times what woulde followe, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwardes they found him a wifer man, then happie in his counsell. Thus Cafar being brought vnto the Catoes Forteaffemblie of the election, in the middest of these two noble persons, whom he had before re- fight and proconciled together: he was there chosen Consul, with Calphurnius Bibalus, without gaine Cafar first C faving or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he beganne to confulhip put foorth lawes meeter for a feditious Tribune of the people, than for a Confull: bicaufe by with Calphan them he preferred the diuision of landes, and distributing of corne to euerie citizen, Gratis, Cefar land. to please them withall. But when the noble men of the Senate were against his deuise, he de- Lex agraria. firing no better occasion, beganne to crie out, and to protest, that by the ouethardnesse and austeritie of the Senate, they draue him against his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon having Crassus on thone side of him, and Pompey on thother, he asked them openly in thaffemblie, if they did gene their confent vnto the lawes which he had put forth. They both aunswered, they did. Then he prayed them to stande by him against those that threatned him with force of fworde to let him. Craffus gaue him his worde, he would. Pompey also did the D like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his fword and target both, against them that would withstand him with their swords. These wordes offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauetie, and vndecent for the maiestie and honor he caried, and most of all vincomely for the presence of the Senate whome he should have reverenced; and were speaches fitter for a rash light headed youth, than for his person. Howbeit the common people on thother fide, they rejoyced. Then Cafar bicause he would be more affured of Pompeis power and frendshippe, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made fure be: who was made fure be fore vnto Seruilius Capio, and promised him in exchaunge Pompeis wife, the which was fure all his designed fo vnto Faustin the some of Sylla. And shortly after also, Cafar selfe did marie Calphurnia the pomper to daughter of Pilo, whom he caused to be made Consulto succeede him the next year's follows called maked E ing, Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnes, that it was a shame? full matter, and not to be suffered, that they should in that forte make hauoke of the Empire of Pigo of ROME, by fuch horrible bawdie matches, distributing among them selues through those wicked mariages, the gouernments of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calpharnius Bibalus, fellow Conful with Cefar, perceiving that he did contend in vaine, making all the reliftaunce he could to withstand this lawe, and that oftentimes he was in daunger to be flaine with Cate, in the market place and affemblie: he kept close in his house all the rest of his Consulthippe. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with fouldiers, & by open force Pompey by authorifed the lawes which Cafer made in the behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procu-

not onely the Senators and nobilitie were offended, but that the common people also for the A reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were ashamed, and went away with silence . he him felfe fecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this parte, there were few Senators that would be Prefident of the Senate vnder him, but left the citie, bicause they could not away with his doinges. And of them, there was an old man called Confidius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to counsel bicause they were afrayed of his souldiers. Casar aunswered him againe: and why then, does not thou kepe thee at home, for the same feare? Consider replied, bicause my age taketh away feare from me : for having fo short a time to live, I have no care to prolonge it further. The shamefullest parte that Cafar played while he was Consul, seemeth to be this: when he chose P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offred his wife fuch dishonor, and profaned the ho-R ly auncient misteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne house. Clodius sued to be Tribune to no other end, but to destroy Cicero: & Casar selse also departed not from Rome to his army, before he had fet them together by the eares, and driven Cicero out of ITALY, All these things they say he did before the warres with the GAVLES. But the time of the great armies & coquests he made afterwards, & of the warre in the which he subdued al the GAVIRE (entring into an other course of life farre contrarie vnto the first) made him to be knowen for as valliant a fouldier & as excellent a Captaine to lead men, as those that afore him had bene counted the wifest and most valliantest Generalles that ever were, and that by their valliant deedes had atchieued great honor. For whofoeuer would compare the house of the Fabiant. of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea those also of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, C Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey felfe, Whose fame ascendeth up unto the heavens: It will appeare that Cafars prowes and deedes of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard contries where he made warres: an other, in enlarging the realmes and contries which he iouned unto the Empire of Rome: an other, in the multitude and power of his enemies whome he ouercame: an other, in the rudenesse and austere nature of men with whom he had to doe, whose maners afterwardes he softned and made civill: an other, in curtesie and clemencie which he vsed vnto them whome he had conquered: an other in great bountie and liberality bestowed upon them that served under him in those warres: and in fine. he excelled them all in the number of battells he had fought, and in the multitude of his ene-D mies he had flaine in battell. For in leffe then tenne yeares warre in GAVLE he tooke by force and affault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred feuerall nations; and having before him in battell thirty hundred thowfand fouldiers, at fundrie times he flue tenne hudred thowfand of them, & tooke as many more prisoners. Furthermore, he was so entirely beloued of his fouldiers, that to doe him feruice (where otherwise they were no more then o-The love and ther men in any private quarrell) if Cafars honor were touched, they were invincible, & would fo desperatly venter them selues, & with such furie, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the exaple of Acilius: who in a battell by sea before the city of Man-SELLES, bording one of his enemies shippes, one cut of his right hand with a fword, but yet he The wonderforfooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his enemies faces, & made E them flie fo that he wanne their shippe from them. And Casina Scana also in a conflict before Scana, & dithe city of DYRRACHIVM, having one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his shoulder striken through with a dart, and his thigh with an other, and having received thirty arrowes upon his thield: he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeelde vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their (houlders from his bodie with his fword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, & at the length saued him felfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITAYNE alfo, when the Captaines of the bandes were driven into a marrifle or bogge full of mire and durt, and that the enemies did fiercelie affaile them there : Cafar then standinge to viewe the battell, he fawe a private fouldier of his thrust in among the Captaines, and fought so valliant-F lie in their defence, that at the length he draue the barbarous people to flye, and by his meanes faued the Captaines, which otherwife were in great daunger to have bene cast away.

A Then this fouldier being the hindemost man of all the Captaines, marching with great maine through the myte & durt, halfe fwithming, and halfe a foote: in the end got to the other fide of but left his shield behinde him. Cafar wondring at his noble corage, range to him with iou to imbrace him. But the poore fouldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes. fell downe at Cafars foete; and befought him to pardon him, for that he had left his targette behinde him. And in A FRICKE also, Scipio having taken one of Cafars thippess and Granius Feed Petronius abourde on her amongest other, not long before chosen Treasorer; he put all the promue reft to the fword but him, and layd he would gene him his life. But Petronim auniwered him againe : that Cafars fouldiers did not vie to have their lives geven them, but to generothers. their lives : and with those wordes he drewe his sworde, and thrust him selfe through Nowe,

R Cafars felfe did breede this noble corage and life in them. First, for that he gaue them bounrifully, & did honor them also, shewing thereby, that he did not heape up riches in the wartes to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honorably to reward their valliant service : and that by so much he thought him selferiche, by howe much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deferued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder to much at his valliantneffe in putting him felfe at enery instant in such manifelt daunger, and in taking so extreame paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedie defire of honor that fet him a fire, and pricked him forward to doe it : but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his bodie could beare, that filled them all with ad. miration. For, concerning the constitucion of his bodie, he was leane, white, and fost skin-C ned, and often subject to headache, and otherwhile to the falling sickenes: (the which tooke, Cefer had the him the first time, as it is reported, in CORDVBA, a citie of SPAYNE) but yet therefore yeel-falling sicks. ded not to the disease of his bodie, to make it a cloke to cherishe him withall, but contrarilie, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his licke bodie fighting alwayes with his difease, trauelling continually, living soberly, and commonly lying abroade in the field. For the most nights he slept in his coch or litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwayes able to do fome thing: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the contricto fee townes, castels, and strong places. He had alwayes a secretarie with him in his coche, who did fill wryte as he went by the way, and a fouldier behinde him that carried his fword. He made fuch speede the first time he came from Rome, when he had his office; that in eight dayes. D he came to the river of Rhone. He was fo excellent a rider of horse from his youth, that holding his handes behinde him, he would galloppe his horse vpon the spurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exercise him selfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupie two fecretaries at once with as much as they could wryte: and as Oppius wryterbamore. then two at a time. And it is reported, that Cafar was the first that deuised frendes might talke together by wryting ciphers in letters, when he had no leafure to speake with them for his vrgent busines, and for the great distaunce besides from Ro ME. How little accompt Cafar made, The sempeof his dyer, this example doth proue it. Cafar supping one night in MILANE with his frende rance of Ca-Valerius Leo, there was served sparrage to his bourde, and oyle of persume put into it in stead don. of fallet oyle. He simplie eate it, and found no fault, blaming his frendes that were offended: Cafaracinity, E and told them, that it had bene enough for them to have absteyned to eate of that they milliked, and notto shame their frend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with frend. his frend. An other time as he trauelled through the contrie, he was driven by fowle weather on the fodgine to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was fo narrowe, that one man could but scarce lye in it. Then he sayd to his frendes that were about him: greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, and the most necessarie roomes, for the fickeft persons. And thereuppon he caused Oppins that was ficke to lye there all night: and he him felfe, with the rest of his frendes, lay with out dores, under the easing of the house. The first warre that Cafar made with the GAVLES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGVAL-NIANS, who having fette fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and foure hun-F dred villages besides, came to inuade that parte of GAVLE which was subject to the Ro-

it out: but their wines and children also fighting for their lines to the death, were all flame: and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Nowe if the act of this victorie was famous, vn. to that he also added an other as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people than had escaped from this battell, he gathered together against about a hundred thowsandeof them, and compelled them to returne home into their contrie which they had for faken, and vnto their townes also which they had burntibicause he feared the GERMAINES would come oper the river of Rheyne, and occupie that contrie lying voyde. The fecond warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he him selfehad caused Arionistus their king, to be received for a confederate of the Romanes. Notwithstan- C ding, they were growen very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainely, that having any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they would not content them with their owne, but ment to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Cafer perceiving that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young gentlemen of noble houses of Rome, who thought to have gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleafure and gaine : he called them to counfell, and commaunded them that were affrayed, that they should depart home, and not put them felues in daunger against their willes, fith they had such womanishe faint hartes to thrinke when he had neede of them. And for him felfe, he fayd, he would fet apon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, faying, that the enemies were no vallianter than the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine infe p rior vnto Marius. This oration being made, the fouldiers of the tenth legion fent their Lieutenauntes vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iorney with good will to ferue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlonges of the campe of the enemies. Arionistus corage was well cooled, when he sawe Casar was come. and that the ROMANES came to feeke out the GERMAINES, where they thought, and made accompt, that they durft not have abidden them : and therefore nothinge mistrustingeit woulde have come so to passe, he wondered much at Cafars corage, and the more when he fave his owne armie in a maze withall. But muche more did their corages fall, by reason of the foolishe women propheciers they had among them, which did foretell thinges to come R who, consideringe the waves and trouble of the rivers, and the terrible novie they made runninge downe the streame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the newe moone. Cafar havinge intelligence thereof, and perceivinge that the barbarous people thereuppon flurred not: thought it best then to sette vppon them, being discoraged with this supersticious feare, rather then losinge time, he shoulde tarie their leasure. So he did skirmishe with them even to their fortes, and litle hilles where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them fo, that with great furie they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them king Arioni in battell, and followed them in chase, with great flaughter, three hundred furlonge, eflus outritire- uen vinto the river of Rheyn: and he filled all the fieldes thitherto with deade bodies and spoyles. Howebeit Arionifus flyinge with speede, gotte ouer the river of Rheyn, and esca-p ped with a fewe of his men. It is fayd that there were flaine foure score thow sande persons at this battel. After this exployte, Cafar left his armie amongest the SEQVANES to winter there:

A & he him felfe in the meane time, thinking of thatfayres at Rome, went ouer the mountaines into GAVLE about the river of Po, being parte of his province which he had in charge, For there, the river called Rubico, devideth the rest of ITALIE from GAVLE on this side the Alpes. Cafar lying there, did practife to make frendes in Rows, bicause many came thither. to fee him: vnto whom he graunted their futes they demaunded, and fent them home alfo. partely with liberall rewards, and partely with large promises and hope. Now during all this conquest of the GAVLES, Pompey did not consider how Casar enterchaungeable did conquer the GAVLES with the weapons of the Romanes, and wanne the Romanes againe with the money of the GAVLES. Cafar being advertised that the BELGE (which were the warlikest men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third parte of GAVLE) were all vp in armes.

R and had raifed a great power of men together : he straight made towardes them with all possible speede, and founde them spoyling and ouerrunninge the contrie of the GANTER, their neighbours, and confederates of the ROMANES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting, The Belee .. cowardly, he ouerthrew the most parte of them which were in a troupe together, & flue such were me by a number of them, that the Romanus passed ouer deepe rivers and lakes a soote, whon their Casar. dead bodies, the rivers were fo full of them. After this overthrow, they that dwelt neerest vnto the sea fide, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld them selues without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his army against the NERVIANS, the stowtest warriers weren the

of all the BELGE. They dwelling in the worde contrie, had conveyed their wives, children flower from and goods, into a maruelous great forrest, as farre from their enemies as they could; and bec ing about the number of fixe fcore thowfand fighting men and more, they came one day and fet apon Cafar, when his armie was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, little looking to have fought that day. At the first charge, they brake the horsemen of the Romanias, and compassing in the twelfth & seventh legion, they slue all the Centurions & Captaines of the bands. And had not Cafar felfe taken his shield on his arme, and flying in amongest the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: & the tenth legion also feeing him in daunger, ronne vnto him from the toppe of the hill where they stoode in battell, and broken the ranckes of their chemies: there had not a Romani escaped a line that day But taking example of Cafars valliantnes, they foughed esperatly beyond their power, and vet could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in manner The Nerwi

It is wrytten that of three skore thowfand fighting men, there escaped only flaine by cabut five hundred and of foure hundred gentlemen and counfellers of the Roman as but three, for faued. The Senate understanding it at Round; ordained that they shoulde doe facrifice unto the goddes, and keepe feastes and solemne processions fifteene dayes together withour intermission, having neuer made the like ordinaunce at Rome, for any victorie that ever was obteined. Bicause they saw the damager had bene maruelous great so many nations rising as they did in armes together against him: and further, the love of the people wnto him made his vi-Cory much more famous. For when Cafar had fee his affaires at a fear in GAV union the other fide of the Albes: he alwayes yied to lye about the river of Po in the winter time, to gene direction for the establishing of thinges at Roma, at his pleasure. For, not only they that made E fute for offices at Rome were chosen Magistrate, by meanes of Cafars money which he gaue; them, withithe which, bribing the people, they bought their wayces, and when they were in a count make office, did althat they could to increase Cafara power and greatnes: but the greatest eachiefest, The great out men also of the noblitie, went vnto Lvx a vnto him. they passed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before into Carnets at Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes steppes, when he fawe that he could not preuaile, non withstande them : he went out of the Senate in choller, and cried out amongest the people. that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him : some for the reuerence the bare vnto Pomper, and Crassiu, and others fauoring Casars proceedinges, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet them selues, and sturred not. Then Cafar returning into GAVLE beyonde the Alpes vnto his armie, founde there a greate warre in the contrie.

The Ipes and

Tenterider Plaine by Ca-Sicambri. a people of the Cefar made bridge oner the river of Rheyn.

For two great nations of GERMANIE had not long before passed ouer the river of Rheyn, to ipes, & Ten. Conquer newe landes: and the one of these people were called IPES, and the other TENTEterides, people RIDES. Now touching the battell which Cefar fought with them, he him felfe doth describe it in his commentaries, in this forte. That the barbarous people having fent Ambassadours R vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time: they not with flanding, against lawe of armes. came and fette apon him as he trauelled by the way, infomuch as eight hundred of their Cefas horse- men of armes ouerthrewe fine thowsande of his horsemen, who nothinge at all mistrusted their comming. Againe, that they fent him other Ambaffadours to mocke him once more but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole armie to marche against them. thinking it a follie, and madnesse, to keepe faith with such trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Canutina wryteth, that the Senate appointing againe to doe newe factifice, procefs fions, and feastes, to gene thankes to the goddes for this victorie: Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cefar thould be deliuered into the handes of the barbarous people, for to pourge their city and common wealth of this breache of faith, and to turne the curfe apon him, that G was the author of it. Of these barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thowsand persons) they were all in maner slaine, sauing a very fewe of them, that flying from the battell got oner the riner of Rheyn againe, who werereceined by the SICAMBRIANS, an other people of the GERMAINES. Cafar taking this occafion against them, lacking no good will of him selfe besides, to have the honor to be counted the first Roman a that ever passed over the river of Rheyn with an armie: he built a bridge of uer it. This river is maruelous broade, and runneth with great furie. And in that place specially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great bredth from one fide to thother, and it hath fostrong and swift a streame besides: that men casting downe great bodies of trees in to the river (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force n thereof maruelously shake the postes of the bridge he had set up. But to preuent the blowes of those trees, and also to breake the furie of the streame : he made a pile of great wodde as bone the bridge a good way, and did forciblie ramme them in to the bottome of the riner, for that in ten dayes space, he had set up and finishe his bridge of the goodliest carpenters worke. and most excellent invention to see to, that could be possiblie thought or devised. Then pass fing ouer his army vponit, he found none that durft any more fight with him. For the S vv 80 VIANS, which were the warlikest people of all GERMANY, had gotten them selves with their goodes into wonderfull great valleis and bogges, full of woddes and forrestes. Nowe when he had burnt all the contrie of his enemies, and confirmed the league with the confederats of the ROMANES: he returned backe againe into GAVIL Bafter he had taried eighteene dayes at p the most in Germany, on thother side of the Rheyn. The iorney he made also into England was a noble enterprise; and very commendable; For he was the first that failed the west Ocean with an army by fea, & that paffed through the fea Atlanticum with his army, comake warres in that fo great & famous Ilande: (which many auncient wryters would not beleue that it was fo in deede, and did make them vary about it, faying that it was but a fable & alve) and was the first that enlarged the Romane Empire, beyonde the earth inhabitable. For twife he passed ouer the narrowe lea against the firme lande of G AVLE, and fighting many battell othere; did! hurt his enemies more, then enriche his come men : bicaufe, of men hardlie broughevp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten: Whereuppoil his warre had not fuch fuccesses as he looked for, and therefore takinge pledges onely of the kinge, and impoling a yearely E tribute apon him, to be payed vnto the people of Rome : he returned again into GAVERO There he was no fooner landed but he founde letters ready to be fent over the fea vnto him?

IVELVS CESAR. is elewhich he was advertised from Rome, of the death of his Daughter, that the was dead The death of with thild by Pompey. For the which, Pompey & Caldr both, were martielous forowfull: & their India, Cafars fiends mourned also, thinking that this alliance which mainteined the common wealth that otherwise was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now severed, and broken a forder. and the rather likely bicause the childe lived not long after the mother. So the common peopleat Rome tooke the corps of Iulia, in dispite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the fielde of Mart Now Cefar being driven to devide his armie (that was very great) into funding garrilons for the winter time, and returning againe into I TALY as he was wont: all GAYLE rebelled apaine, and had rayled great armies in every quarter to fet apon the Romanes, and to affay if The rebellion they could dittreffe their forts where they lay in garrison. The greatest number and most war- of the Gaules likemen of thefe GAV LE sithat entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambioria; and And did fet yoon the parrisons of Cotta, and Titarias, whom they flue, and all the foundiers they coun, and Tie had about them. Then they went with three score thowsand fighting men to beseege the gar-turing, with filon which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almost taken them by force, bidding all same the fouldiers were every man of them hurt: but they were fo valiant and courageons; that they did more then men (as they fay) in defending of them felues. These newes being come to ? far who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speede ; and lettying Gren thow fand fouldiers, made hafte to helpe Cicero that was in fuch diffresse. The GAVI is that did befeege Cicero, understanding of Cafars comming, rayled their feege incontinently to goe and meete him: making accompt that he was but a handfull in their handes, they were Ofosewe, Cafar to deceive them, still drewe backe, and made as though he fled from them, Todging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wife to flurre out to skirmish with them, but comdelle them to ray fe vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were atraid bicaufé the enemies should the lesse esteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke oppolytimitie, by their diforderly coming to affaile the trenches of his campe, they were growen in flich a prefumptious boldness and brauery) and then falving out apon them, he put them Cafer the the all to flight with flavighter of a great number of them. This did suppresse all the rebellions of Gaules led by the GAV LES in those parties, and furthermore, he him selfe in person went in the middlest of winter thether. Where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a newe supply out of Direct of three whole legions in their roome, which he had loft: of the which, two of them fimper lent him, and the other legion, he him felfe had leauved in Gaves about the ritter of Po During these sturres, brake forth the beginning of the greatest & most daungerous warre that he had in all Gavier, the which had bene fecretly practifed of long time by the chiefelf & most warlike people of that contry, who had leaused a wonderfull great power. For every where they leavied multitudes of men, & great riches befides, to fortefie their stronge holdes, Fuffhermore the contry where they rofe, was very ill to come vnto, and specially at that time The second being winter, when the rivers were frolen, the woodes and fortells covered with flowe. The the Gaules as metadowes drowned with fluddes, and the fieldes so deepe of snow, that no wayes were to be gamp coffee with meither the marifles nor rivers to be decerned, all was fo overflowed and drowned with water all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Calar from ferring vion the rebels. Many nations of the GAVLES were of this conspiracy, but two of the chiefest were the ARVERNIANS and CARNVIES: who had chosen Vercingentifix for their Lieuete- Vercingents-Bailt generall whole father the GAVLES before had put to death, bicavile they thought he af rix Captains. plied to make him felfe king. them, vntill Cafar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMANES them felues, which kept watch vpon the wall that was built against the citie, knew also no more of it, then they, but when it was done, and that they heard the cryes and lamentacions of men & women in ALBXIA, when they perceived on thother fide of the citie fuch a nuber of gliftering shields of gold and filuer, such store of bloody corfelets and armors, such a deale of plate and mouse ables, and such a number of tents and paullyons after the facion of the GAVEES, which the ROMANES had gotten of their spoyles in their campe. Thus sodainely was this great armie van nished as a dreame or vision: where the most part of them were slaine that day in battell Fur thermore, after that they within the citie of ALBXIA had done great hurt to Cafar, and them felues also : in the ende, they all yelded them selues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Capteine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horsefurnished with riche capparison accordingly, and rode round about Casar, who sage in his chayer of effate. Then lighting from his horse, he tooke of his capparison and furniture, and vnarmed him selfe, and layed all on the ground, and went and sate downeat Casar secte, and sayd never a word. So Cafar at length committed him as a prisoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in his triumphe at Rome. Nowe Cafar had of long time derermined to destroy Page pey, and Pompey him also. For Craffus being killed amongest the PARTHIANS, who onely didse, that one of them two must needes fall: nothing kept Cefar from being the greatest person but bicaule he destroied not Pompey, that was the greater neither did any thing let Pampey to with him to that greatnes he was come vnto But Cafar contrarily, having had that drift in his head of the civil from the beginning, like a wreftler that studieth for trickes to ouerthrowe his adversary! he cases craftiwent farre from Rom B, to exercise him selfe in the warres of Gavis, where he did trayne his new annie, and prefernly by his valiant deedes did increase his fame and honor. By these meanes became Cefar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution but fome occasions of culler, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly also the ryme deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernment at that tyme of the com-Emon wealth at ROME. For they that made fute for honor and offices, bought the voyces of the The beadle people with ready money, which they gaue out opely to viury, without hame or feare. Therewon, the common people that had fold their voyces for money, came to the market place at at Rome for the day of election, to fight for him that had hivered them:not with their voices, but with their

howes flings, and fwordes. So that the affembly feldom tyme brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and sprinckled with the bloode of them that were slavne in the market without a Pilote. Infomuch, as men of deepe judgement & discression seing such furie & madnes of the people, thought the felues happy if the comon wealth were no worfetroubled, the with the absolut state of a Monarchy & soueraine Lord to gouerne them. Furthermore, there C were many that were not affraid to speake it opely, that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the comon wealth, but by the authority of one man only that should command the all & that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the getlest Phisition, meaning couertly Fompey. Now Pompey vied many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly under hand did lay all the yrons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the mark he shot at, & searing leaft in the end the people thould be compelled to make him Dictator: he perswaded the Senatrather to make him fole Conful, that contenting him felf with that more just & lawful gouernment the should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsel, did not only make him Conful, but further did protoge his government of the provinces he had. For Pompo go ped with roddes, who came to ROME about those matters: & faid, he gaue him those markes, Cefar a fuccessor: and moreover, he sent vnto Cafar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of GAVLE. Casar sent him them againe, and gaucemery pri-

Dhe had two provinces, all Spayne, & Africk, the which he governed by his Lieuetenants: & and spick further, he received yearely of the common treasure to pay his fouldiers a thowsand talents. Hereuppon Cafar tooke occasion also to fend his men to make sute in his name for the Con- Cafar such fullhip, & also to have the government of his provinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his the second peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Casar) withstood them, and to shame sul, and to and dishonor him, had much needeles speech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke have his goaway the fredom from the COLONYES which Cafar had lately brought vnto the citie of No-YVM COMV M in GAV LE towards ITALY, where Cafar not long before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Conful he made one of the Senators in that citie to be whip-

E that he should know he was no Romane Citizen, and bad him goe his way, and tel Cefar of it. After Marcellus Confulship, Cafar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotte among the GAVLES, did franckely give it out amongest the Magistrates at Rome, without restrainte or spare. First, he set Curio, the Tribune cleare out of debt : and gaue also vnto Paule the Consul fines at a thowfand five hundred talents, with which money he built that notable pallace by the mar- Rome. ket place, called Paules Basilicke, in the place of Fuluius Basilicke. Then Pompey being affraid of this practife, began openly to procure, both by him felfe and his friends, that they thould fend uate fouldier, two hundred and fiftie filuer drachmas. Now, they that brought thefe two legi-F ons backe from Cafar, gaue out ill and feditious wordes against him amonge the people, and pomper atm. did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was sed by flantmaruelously defired and wished for in Casars campe: and that though in Rome, for the ma-

lice and fecret spite which the gonernours there did beare him, he could hardly obteyneshing he desired : yet in Gav LE he might assure him selfe, that all the armie was at his commanned ment. They added further alfo, that if the fouldiers there did once returne ouer the mounts taines againe into I TALY, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Gafar: bicause he wearied them with too much labor and continuall fight, and withal, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding securitie in Pompey, & a vaine conceit of him selfemade him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparatio for warre as though he had no occasion to be affraid : but onely studied to thwart Cafar in speech, & to crosse the sutes he made. Howbeit Cafar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cafars Captaines which was fent to Rome to profecute his fure, being at the Senate dore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Celars time of gouernment which he fued for: clapping his hand vpon his a fword, he faid, fith you wil not graut it him, this shal give it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Cafar propownded, caried great femblance of reason with them. For he faid, that he was contented to lav downe armes, to that Pompey did the like: & that both of them as privat perfons should come & make sute of their Citizens to obtaine honorable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, & graunting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongefully, accuse him in going about to make him selfe a tyranne, & in the meane time to graunt the de ther meanes to be a tyranne. Curio making these offers & persuasions opely before the people, in the name of Cafar: he was heard with great reloycing & clapping of hands, and there were fome that cast flowers and no legayes woon him when he went his way, as they commonly vie to doe vnto any man, when he hath obteined victorye, and wonne any games. Then Antonius O one of the Tribunes, brought a letter fent from Cafar, and made it openly to be read in despite of the Confuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Celar. did not dismisse his armie by a certaine day appoynted him, the Romanes should proclayme him an enemie vnto Rome. Then the Confuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismisse his armie: But few agreed to that demaund, After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cafar should dismisse his armie: thereto they all in manner aunswered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested agayne that bothe of them should lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithstanding, bicause Scipio did insolently behaue him selfe, and Marcellus also, who cryed that they must vie force of armes, & not mens opinions against a theefe: the Senate rose straight upon it without D further determination, & men chaunged apparel through the citie bicause of this diffention, as they vie to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cafar, which femed much more reasonable in the which he requested that they would graunt him GAVIE, that lyeth betwene the Mountaines of the Alpes & ITALY, & ILLYRIA, with two legions only, & then that he would request nothing els, vntil he made sute for the second Consulfhip. Cite-70 the Orator, that was newly come from his gouernment of CILICIA, trauelled to reconcile them together, & pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him, he would yeld to any thing he would have him, so he did let him alone with his armie. So Cicero perswaded Casars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and fix thowsand men onely, that they might be friends & at peace together. Pompey very willingly yelded vnto it, & graunted them. But Lentu- E lus the Conful would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they them felues gaue Cafar a happy occasion & culler, as could be, stirring vp his fouldiers the more against them, whe he spewed them these two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were drium to flie, difguifed like flaues, in a cariers cart. For, they were driuen for feare to steale out of Rome, disguised in that manner. Nowe at that time, Casar had not in all about him, aboue fine thowfand footemen, and three thowfand horsemen; for the rest of people, fly from his armie, he left on thother fide of the Mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieuetenants.So, confidering that for the eccution of his enterprife, he should not neede so many men of warre at the first, but rather sodainly stealing vpon them, to make them affraid with his valiantnes, taking benefit of the oportunitie of tyme, bicause he should more easily make his e- F nemies affraid of him, comming so sodainly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise distresse them, assailing them with his whole armie, in giving them leysure to pro-

A midefurther for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieuetenants to go before without any other armor then their fwords, to take the citie of ARIMINVIN, (a great citie of GAVIR. being the first citie men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as little bloodshed and tumult. as they could possible. Then committing that force and armie he had with him, vnto Hortensian one of his friends: he remey ned a whole day together, openly in the fight of energy man, to see the sworde players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongest them, and made mery with them a while, whome he had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forwarde night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be mery, and no man to flurre, for he would ftraight come to them againe: howebeit he had fecretly before comn maunded a fewe of his trustiest friendes to followe him, not altogether, but some one way, and some an other way. He him selfe in the meane tyme tooke a coche he had hyered, and made as though he woulde have gonne fome other waye at the first, but sodainely he turned backe againe towardes the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle ryuer of Rubicon, which deuideth GAV LE on this fide the Alpes from ITALY: he stayed yppon a sodaine. For the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his consci- casars doubtence, to thinke what an enterprise he tooke in hand: & his thoughts also fell out more doubt- full shoughts full, when he entred into confideration of the desperatnes of his attempt. So he fell into many Rubicon thoughts with him felfe, and spake neuer a word, wauing sometime one way, sometime an other way, and often times chaunged his determination, contrary to him felfe. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongest whom was Asinius Pollio, telling them what mischieues the beginning of this passage ouer that river would breede in the world, and how much their posteritie and them that lived after them, would speake of it in time to come. But at length, casting from him with a noble courage, all those perillous thoughts to come, & speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt daungerous and desperat enterprises, A desperat man feareth no daunger, come on : he passed ouer the river, and when The Greeke he was come ouer, he ranne with his coche and neuer staied, so that before day light he was phrase of within the citie of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is faid, that the night before he passed ouer this perspect river, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The citie of ARIMI- the dye. NVM being taken, and the rumor thereof dispersed through all ITALY, euen as if it had bene o- the citie of A. pen warre both by sea & land, & as if all the lawes of Rome, together with thextreme bounds riminum and confines of the fame had bene broken vp: a man would have fayd, that not onely the men Cafari dam and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities them felues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALY. And ROME it felfe Rome in the allows immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours therea- require cebouts, which came thither from all parties like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer for comming. nor Magistrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perswafton of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude: so that Roma had in maner destroyed it selfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were daungerous sturres and tumults every where: bicause they that were glad of this E trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running up and downe the citie, when they met with others in divers places, that seemed either to be affraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey him selfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill wordes some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproued him, and sayd that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly, because he had made Casar so great and stronge against him & the common wealth. And other againe did blame him, bicause he had refused the honest offers and reasonable condicions of peace, which Cafar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consul to abuse him too much. On thother fide, Phaonius spake vnto him, and bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey beeing one day in a brauerie in the Senate, fayd openly: let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he lysted, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with fouldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that tyme had

fill marching on, by small iorneys came at length vnto the citie of BRVNDVSTVM. But when they were come, & found that Cafar had already passed ouer the sea, then they straight chaun-

Captaines, bicause they had not made them make more haste in marching: and sitting vpon the rockes and clyffes of the sea, they looked ouer the mayne sea, towards the Realme of Epi-

E ged their complaints and mindes. For they blamed them selues, and tooke on also with their

A When he had spokenthus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple dore where the treasure Celeraketh laye: and finding no keyes there, he caused Smythes to be fent for, and made them breake the temple of open the lockes. Metellus thereuppon beganne agayne to withftande him, and certen men Saisene. that stoode by prayled him in his doing: but Cafar at length speaking biggely to him, threatned him he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, vounge man, o he, thow knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, than to doe it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he gotte him away roundly: and ever after that, Cafar had all at his commaundement for the warres. From thence he went into Spayne, to make Cafactoring warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieuetenants: first to gette their armies and prouin- against Pomces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwardes he might follow Pompey the better, por Liente-B leauing neuer an enemie behinde him. In this iorney he was oftentymes him felfe in daunger, through the ambushes that were layde for him in divers straunge forces and places, and likely also to haue lost all his armie for lacke of vittells. All this notwithstanding, he neuer untill he had gotten their campe & armies into his handes, albeit that the Lieuetenants them selves fled vnto Pompey. When Casar returned agayne to Rome, Piso his father in lawe gaue him counsell to sende Ambassadors vnto Pompey, to treate of peace. But Isaurieus, to slatter Cafar, was against it. Cafar beeing then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honor, whose fathers before had beene flavne in Syllaes tyme: and did somewhat cutte of the viuries that did oppressethem, and be-C sides, did make some such other ordinances as those, but very sewe. For he was Dictator but Casta Dista-eleuen dayes onely, and then did yeld it vppe of him felfe, and made him felfe Conful, with tor. Seruilius Ifauricus, and after that determined to followe the warres. All the rest of his armie feericus conhe left comming on the way behind him, and went him felfe before with fix hundred horses, fulls. and fine legions onely of footemen, in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuary, which after the ATHENIANS, is called Postdeon. Then having past over the sea Ionium, cefargouth and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he fent his into the king.

shippes backe againe vnto BRVNDV SIVM, to transport the rest of his souldiers that could not come with that speede he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of bo- complaints of dy, & lufty youth, was decayed) being wearied with fo many fundry battells as they had fought the olde foul D with their enemies: complayned of Cafar in this force. To what ende and purpose doth this direct against man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vling vs like flaues and drudges? It is not our armor, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, shall we never be without our harnes of our backes, and our shieldes on our armes? should not Cefar thinke, at the least when he feeth our blood and woundes, that we are all mortall men, and that we feelethe miferie and paynes that other men doe feele? And now even in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercie of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods them selues can not withstand: as if he sed

RVs, to fee if they could discerne the shippes returning backe, to transport them ouer. Cefar in the meane time being in the citie of APOLLONIA, having but a small armie to fight with Pomper, it greued him for that the rest of his armie was so long a comming, not knowing what way to take. In the ende he followed a daungerous determinacion, to imbarke vnknowen in a little pynnase of twelue ores onely, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDV $1 VM : the which he Agree ad-

could not doe without great daunger, confidering that all that fea was full of Pompeys thippes mention of and armies. So he tooke shippe in the night apparelled like a slaue, and went aborde vpon this cafe. F litle pynnase, & said neuer a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condicion. The pynnase laye in the mouth of the river of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme & quiet, by reason of a litle wind that came from the shore, which every morning draue

mination. For they brought him so many lyes, and put so many examples of feare before him. as if Cafar had bene already at their heeles, and had wonne all: fo that in the ende he yelded vnto them, and gaue place to their furie and madnes, determining (feeing all thinges in fuch tumult and garboyle) that there was no way but to forfake the citie, and thereuppon commaunded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tary there, vnles he loued tyrannie, more then his owne libertie and the common wealth. Thus the Confuls them felues, before they had done their common facrifices accustomed at their going out of the citie, fled every man of them. So did likewise the moste parte of the Senators, taking their owne thinges in haste. fuch as came first to hande, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were fome of them also that alwayes loued Casar, whose witts were then so troubled and besides a them selues, with the seare they had conceyued: that they also sled, and followed the streams of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessitie. But aboue all thinges, it was a lamentable fight to see the citie it selfe, that in this seare and trouble was left at all adventure, as a shippe

being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pom-per) to bee their naturall contry, and reckoned Rome no better then Cafars campe. Atthe poylon. The Philition gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them reporte what clemencie and wonderfull curtefie Cafar vied vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had dronke this drinke, and beganne to la-

Lebienius for- tyme also Labienus, who was one of Cafars greatest friendes, and had bene alwayes vied as his Lieuetenant in the warres of GAVLE, and had valiantly fought in his cause: he likewise fooke Cafar, and fled to for fooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cafar fent his money and carriage after him, and Pompey. then went and encamped before the citie of Confinium, the which Domitius kept, with C thirty cohorts or ensignes. When Domitius fawe he was befeeged, he straight thought him felfe but vndone, and dispayring of his successe, he bad a Phissition, a slaue of his, giue him ment and bewayle his desperate resolucion taken to dye. The Phisition did comfort him againe, and tolde him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him fleepe, but not to deftroy him. Then Domitius rejoyced, and went straight and yelded him felfe vnto Cafar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stale away immediatly, and sled vnto Pomper, When these newes were brought to Rome, they did maruelously rejoyce and comfort them that n still remayned there: and moreouer there were of them that had for faken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane time, Cafar did put all Domitius men in paye, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leavied men for Pompey. Now Cafar having affembled a great and dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to finde Pompey him felfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of BRUNDVSIVM, from whence he had fent the two Confuls before with that armiche had, vnto Dyrrachivm: and he him felfe also went thither afterwards, when he vnderstoode that Cafar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cafar lacked no good bicause they feared Pompey for that they had forsaken him, or els for that they thought Casar ment not as he spake, but that they were wordes of course, to culler his purpose withall. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but tolde him that it was against the lawe: Tushe, sayd he, tyme of warre and lawe are two thinges. If this that I doe, o he, doe offende thee, then get thee hence for this tyme: for warre can not abyde this francke and bolde speeche. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet agayne, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit p what thou wilt: and yet I doe tell thee this of fauor, impaying so much my right, for thou art myne, both thou, and all them that have rifen against me, and whom I have in my hands.

that in leffe then three skore dayes, he was Lord of all I TALY, without any blood shed. Who p when he was come to Rome, and found it much quietter then he looked for, and many Sena-tours there also: he curteously intreated them, and prayed them to fend vnto Pompey, to paci-fie all matters betweene them, apon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either

ting against the violence of the rage & waves of the sea, the encownter was maruailous dawn gerous, the water of the river being driven backe, and rebounding vpward, with great novie and daunger in turning of the water. Thereuppon the Maister of the pynnase seeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this river, bad the Maryners to cast about againe, and to returne against the streame. Cafar hearing that, straight discouered him selfe vnto the Maister of the pynnase, who at the first was amazed when he saw him: but Casar then taking him by the hand favd vnto him good fellow be of good cheere and forwardes hardily feare not for thou hast Casar and his fortune with thee. Then the Maryners forgetting the daunger of the storme they were in laid on lode with ores, and labored for life what they could against the winde to get out of the mouth of this river. But at length, perceiving they labored in vaine, and that the pynnase tooke in aboundance of water, and was ready to sincke: Casar then to his great griefe was driven to returne backe again. Who when he was returned vnto his campe, his fouldiers came in great companies vnto him, & were very fory, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in daunger, to goe fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius artined, and brought with him the rest of his armie from BRYNDVSIVM, Then Casar finding him felfe ftrong enough, went & offered Pompey battel, who was paffingly well lodged for vittelling of his campe both by sea & land. Casar on thother side, who had no great plenty of vittels at the first, was in a very hard case: insomuch as his men gathered rootes, & mingled the with milke, C. & eate them. Furthermore, they did make breade of it also, & sometime when they skirmished with the enemies, & came alongest by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their trenches, and fayd: that as longe as the earth brought forth fuch frutes, they would neuer leave befeeging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly commaunded them, that they should neither cary those words nor bread into their campe, fearing least his mens hartes would faile them, and that they would be affraid, when they should thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whome they had to fight, fithe they were weary with no paynes, no more then brute beaftes. Cafars men did daily skirmishe hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe in the which Cafar had euer the better fauing once only at what tyme his men fled with fuch feare that all his campe that daye was in greate hazarde to have beene caste awaye. For Pompey came on with his D battell apon them, and they were not able to abyde it, but were fought with, and dryuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with deade bodyes, which were flavne within the very gate and bullwarkes of their campe, they were fo valiantly purfued. Cafar stoods before them that fledde, to make them to turne heade agayne: but he coulde not preuayle, For when he woulde have taken the enfignes to have flayed them, the enfigne bearers threw them downe on the grounde: fo that the enemyes tooke two and thirtye of them, and Cafars selfe also scaped hardely with lyse. For stryking a greate bigge souldier that fledde by him, commaunding him to staye, and turne his face to his enemie: the fouldier beeing affrayde, lift uppe his fworde to stryke at Cafar. But one of Cafars Pages preuenting him, gaue him suche a blowe with his sworde, that he strake of his showlder. Cesar that daye E was brought vnto fo greate extremitie, that (if Pompey had not eyther for feare, or fpytefull fortune, left of to followe his victorie, and retyred into his campe, beeing contented to have dryuen his enemyes into their campe) returning to his campe with his friendes he cesar worder savde vnto them: the victorie this daye had beene our enemies, if they had had a Captayne, that coulde have tolde howe to have overcome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bedde, and that nyght troubled him more, then any nyght that ever he had. For still his mynde ranne with great forowe of the fowle faulte he had committed in leading of his armie, of felfe will to remaine there so longe by the sea side, his enemies beafter bis loffe. ing the stronger by sea: considering that he had before him a goodly contrie, riche and plentifull of all thinges, and goodly cities of MACEDON and THESSALY, and had not the F witte to bringe the warre from thence, but to lose his tyme in a place, where he was rather befeeged of his enemyes for lacke of vittells, then that he did befeege them by

A force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to fee him felfe fo strayghted with vittells, and to thinke of his yll lucke, he rayled his campe, intending to goe fette vppon Scipio, making accompt, that either he should drawe Pompey to battell against his will, when he had not the fea at his backe to furnish him with plentye of vittells: or els that he should easily ouercome scipio finding him alone, vnles he were ayded. This remoue of Cafars campe, did much encourage Pompeys armie and his captaines, who would needes in any case have followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled . But for Pompey him felfe, he would in no respect hazard battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding him selfe wel pro- for the ware. nided of all thinges necessary to tary tyme, he thought it better to drawethis warre out in length by tract of time, the rather to confume this litle strength that remayned in Cafars arn mie: of the which, the best men were marueilous well trayned and good souldiers, and for valiantnes at one daies battell, were incomparable. But on thother fide againe, to remoue here and there so ofte, and to fortifie their campe where they came, and to beseege any wall, or to keepe watch all night in their armor the most part of them could not doe it, by reason of their age, beeing then vnable to away with that paynes, so that the weakenes of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hartes. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease amonge them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate: yet was not this the worst. For besides, he had no store of money neither could tell how to come by vittells: so that it semed in all likelihood, that in very short tyme he would come to nothing. For these respectes, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his minde in that, who stucke in it the rather, bicause he would anoyde sheding of his contry mens bloode. For when Cato had viewed the deade bodies flayne in the campe of his enemies, at the last skirmish that was betweene them, the which were no leffe then a thowfand perfons: he concred his face, and went away weeping . All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, bycause Pompey calhe fo long refrayned from battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamem- led Agamemnon, and king of kinges, faying, that he delayed this warre in this fort, bicaufe he would not of kinges leaue his authoritie to commaund them all, and that he was glad alwaies to fee fo many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honor him, and waite vpon him. And Faonius also, a harebrayed fellowe, frantykly counterfeating the round and playne speeche of Cato, made as though he was maruailous angry, and fayd: is it not great pitie, that we shall D not eate this yeare of Tusculum figges, and all for Pompeys ambicious minde to raigne alone? and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAYNE, (where bis cause he had but ill successe, he was accused of treason, that for money he had solde his armie vnto Cafar:) he went bufily asking, why they fought not with that Marchant, vnto whom they sayde he had solde the province of SPAYNE? So that Pompey with these kinds of specches, against his will, was driven to followe Casar, to fight with him. Then was Casar at the first, maruailously perplexed, and troubled by the waye: bicause he founde none that would giue him any vittells, beeing despised of euery man, for the late losse and ouerthrowe he had receyued. But after that he had taken the citie of Gomphes in Thessaly, he did not one. The citie of Gomphes in ly meete with plentie of vittells to relieue his armie with: but he straungely also did ridde Thessay. E them of their disease. For the souldiers meeting with plentie of wyne, drinking harde, and making mery: draue awaye the infection of the pestilence. For they disposed them selues unto dauncing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the waye: infomuch that drinking droncke they ouercame their disease, and made their bodies newe agayne. When they both came into the contry of PHARSALIA, and both campes laye before thother: Pompey returned agayne to his former determination, and the rather, bicause he had ill signes and tokens of misfortune in his sleepe. For he thought in his sleepe that when he entred into the Pompers Theater, all the ROMANES received him with great clapping of handes. Whereuppon, dreame in they that were about him grewe to suche boldnes and securitie, assuring them selues of via Thomselia. ctorie: that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a brauery contended betweene them selues, for of the Pom-incontinently after the warres. But belides those, the younge gentlemen, and ROMANE A knightes were maruelous defirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with eliftering gilt armors, their horses fat and very finely kept, and them selues goodly young men to the number of feuen thowfand, where the gentlemen of Cafars fide, were but one thowfand onely. The number of his footemen also were much after the same reckoning. Forher had fine and forty thowsand against two and twenty thowsand . Wherefore Casar called his fouldiers together, & told the how Cornificius was at hande, who brought two whole legions. and that he had fifteene enfignes led by Calenus, the which he made to ftay about M B G A R A & ATHENS. Then he asked them if they would tary for that ayde or not, or whether they would rather them felues alone venter battell. The fouldiers cryed out to him, and prayed him not to deferre battell but rather to deuise some fetche to make the enemy fight assoone as he could, a Then as he facrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his armie: the first beast was no fooner facrificed, but his Soothfayer affured him that he should fight within three dayes, Cafar asked him againe, if he faw in the facrifices, any lucky figne, or token of good lucke. The Soothfaver auniwered, for that, thou shalt auniwer thy selfe, better then I can doe: for the gods doe promife vs a maruelous great chaunge, and alteracion of thinges that are now, vnto an other cleane contrary. For if thou beeft well now doeft thou thinke to have worse fortune hereafter and if thou be ill, affure thy felf thou shalt have better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to visite the watch, men saw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cafars campe, and fell downe in Pompeys, In the morning also when they relecued the watche, they heard a false alarom in the enemies campe, without any apparant cause. which they commonly call, a fodaine feare, that makes men befides them felues. This notwithstading, Casar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to have raised his camp from thence, and to have gone towards the citie of Scoty sa; and his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowen when his skowtes came in with great speede, to bringe him newes that his enemies were preparing them selues to fight. Then he was very glad, & after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he fet his men in battell ray, & denided them into three squadrons: giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left wingevnto Antonius, and placed him felfe in the right winge, choosing his place to fight in the tenthlegion. But seeing that against that, his enemies had set all their horsemen: he was halfe affraid when he saw the great number of them, and so braue besides. Wherefore he closely madesix n enfignes to come from the rerewarde of his battell, whom he had layd as an ambushe behind his right winge, having first appointed his fouldiers what they should do, when the horsemen of the enemies came to give them charge. On thother fide, Pompey placed him felf in the right winge of his battell, gaue the left winge vnto Domitius, and the middle battell vnto Scipio his order of bassel father in law. Now all the Romane knightes (as we have told you before) were placed in the left winge, of purpose to enuyrone Casars right wing behinde, and to give their hottest charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their accompt, that there was no foundron of footemen how thicke focuer they were, that could receive the charge of fo great a trowpe of horsemen, and that at the first onset, they should ouerthrow them all, and marche vpon their bellies. When the trompets on either fide did found the alarom to the battell, Pom- E per commaunded his footemen that they should stande still without sturring, to receive the An ill counfet charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherefore Calar afterwardes fayde, that Pompey had committed a fowle faulte, not to confider that the charge which is given ronning with furie, befides that it giveth the more strength also vnto their blowes, doth fette mens hartes also a fire: for the common hurling of all the souldiers that, ronne together, is vnto them as a boxe of the eare that settes men a fire. Then Casar making his battell marche forwarde to give the onfette, fawe one of his Captaines avaliant man, and very skillfull in warre, in whome he had also greate confidence) speaking to his fouldiers that he had under his charge, encouraging them to fight lyke men that daye. So he called him alowde by his name, and fayde vnto him: well, Caius Crassinius, what hope shall A we have to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crastinius casting vp his hand, aunswered him alowd: this day, O Cafar, we shall have a noble victory, and I promise

A thee ere night thou shalt prayse me alyue or dead. When he had told him so, he was him selfe the bestell in the foremost man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, beeing Phaglatia. about fix foore men, and making a lane through the foremost ranckes, with great slaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this fort, he was thrust in at length in the mouth with a sworde, that the poynt of it came out against a his necke. Nowe the footemen of both battells being come to the fworde, the horsemen of the left winge of Pompey, did marche as fiercely also, ipreading out their trowpes, to compaffe in the right winge of Cefars battell. But before they beganne to give charge, the fix enfignes of footemen which Cafar had layed in ambushe behinde him, they beganne to runne full apon them, not throwing away their dartes farre of as they were wont to doe, neyther striking B their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to seeke to hit them full in the eyes, and to calde trade hurt them in the face, as Cafar had taught them. For he hoped that thefe lufty younge gentle: general men that had not bene often in the warres, nor were yied to fee them felues hurt & the which. beeing in the pryme of their youth and beautie, would be affrayd of those hurtes, aswell for the feare of the present daunger to be slayne, as also for that their faces should not for ever bedeformed. As in deede it came to passe, for they could never abyde that they shoulde come so neare their faces, with the poyntes of their dartes, but honge downe their heades for feare to be hitte with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, bicause they shoulde not be hurt. Then, breaking of them selves, they beganneat length cos wardly to flye, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys armie. For they C that had broken them, ranne immediatly to fette vpon the fquadron of the footemen behind, cala merand flue them . Then Pompey feeing his horsemen from the other winge of his barrell fo feat Pompey. sered and dispersed, flying away: forgate that he was any more Pompey the great which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whose wittes the goddes had taken from him, being affrayde and amazed with the flaughter fent from aboue, and so retyred into his tent speaking neuer a worde, and fate there to fee the ende of this battell. Vntill at length all his army beeing ouerthrowen, and put to flight; the enemies came, and gotte vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hande to hande with them that stoode to defende the same. Then as a man come to him selfe agayne, he spake but this onely worde: What, emen into our campe? So in haste, casting of his coate armor and apparell of a generall, he pomera D shifted him, and put on such, as became his miserable fortune, and so stale out of his campe, flight. Furthermore, whathe did after this ouerthrowe, and howe he had put him felfe into the handes of the AGYPTIANS, by whome he was miserably flayne: we have sette it for the at large in his life. Then Cafar entring into Pompeys campe, and feeing the bodies layed on the grounde that were flayne, and others also that were a killing, fayde, fetching a great figher it was their owne doing, and against my will. For Cains Cafar, after he had wonne so many famous conquests, and ouercomeso many great battells, had been exterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his armie. Asimius Pollio writeth, that he spake these wordes then in Latyn, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and layeth furthermore, that the moste parte of them which were put to the sworde in the campe, were slaves and bond-E men, and that there were not flayne in all at this battell, aboue fix thow fand fouldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, Cafar did put many of them amongest his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, amonge whome Brutus was one, that afterwardes flue Brutus the Cefar him felfe: and it is reported, that Cefar was very fory for him, when he could not imme - flue Cefar was diatly be founde after the battell, and that he reioyced againe, when he knewe he was alyue, and that he reioyced againe, when he knewe he was alyue, and that he came to yeelde him felie vinto him . Cafar had many fignes and tokens of victorie of Phatfatta. before this battell : but the notablest of all other that hapned to him, was in the citie of Trans- Signes on 10-LES. For in the temple of victorie, within the same citie, there was an image of Cafer, and the for victory. earth all about it very hard of it felfe, and was patied belides with hard flone; and yet some say that there sprange vppe a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PAD yA, Astronge F Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothiayer, (a contry man and friende of Titus Linius the Historiographer) was by chaunce at that time let to beholde the flying of birdes . etten now they gate the onfet on both fides, and both armies do meete at this instant. Then a fitting downe against confider of the birdes, after he had bethought him of the fignes: fodainely rose up on his feete, and cryed out as a man possessed with some spirit, oh, Calmithe victory is thine. Every man wondring to fee him, he tooke the crowne he had on his heade and made an other than he would never put it on againe, till the event of his prediction has proved his arte true. Linie testifieth, that it so came to passe. Cafar afterwards giving freedom ento the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wanne in their contry, he followed after Pompey. When he came into Asia, he gaue freedom also vnto the Guidians for Theo. pempus fake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release A six also, the thirde part of the tribute which the inhabitants payd vnto the ROMANES. Then he came into ALEXAN-DRIA, after Pompey was flaine: and detefted Theodorn, that prefented him Pompeys heade, and n turned his head at toe fide bicaufe he would not fee it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his sealer and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he curteoutly vsed all Pompeys friendes and familiers. who wandring up and downe the contry were taken of the king of Æ G YPT, and wanne them all to be at his commaundement. Continuing these curtesies, he wrote vinto his friendes at Czfarsware in Alexan-Pothinus the Europe com who bearing the greatest swaye of all the kinges fermants, after he had caused Pomper to be r fed Pompey to be flayne.

Wherefore Cafar hearing an inckling of it, beganne thenceforthe spend all the night long in feathing and bancketing, that his person might be in the better fafetie. But befides all this, Pothinus the Euenuke spake many thinges openly not to be borne, onely to thame Cafar, and to ftirre vp the people to enuichim. For he made his fouldiers have the worst and oldest wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complayne of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at anothers mans coste. And he would serue them

Howbeit then he asked a Myllion to paye his fouldiours withall. Thereto Pothinus aunswered him, that at that tyme he should doe better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwardes that he should at more levsure recount his dette, with the kinges good will and fauor. Cafar replyed vnto him, and favo, that he would not aske counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his affayres, but would be payd: and thereupon fecretly fent for Cleopatra which was in the contry to come vnto him. She onely taking Apollodo-FM SICILIAN Of all her friendes, tooke a little bote, and went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foote of the castell. Then having no other meane to come in to the court, without being knowen, the laid her felfe downe vpon a mattreffe or flockbed; which Apollodorus her frend tied & bound up together like a buddel with a great leather thong. E and so tooke her vp on his backe, and brought her thus hamperd in this fardell vnto Cafar, in at the castell gate. This was the first occasion, (as it is reported) that made Casar to lone her. but afterwards, when he fawe her fweete conversation and pleasaunt entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her again vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two loyntly should raigne together. Apon this newe reconciliation, a great feast being prepared, a flaue of Cafars that was his barber, the fearefullest wretch that lived, still bufily prying and liftening abroad in every corner, being miftruftfull by nature: found that Pothinus and Achellas did lie in waite to kill his Maister Cafar. This beeing proued vnto Cafar, he did fette fuch fure watch about the hall, where the feafte was made, that in fine, he flue the Euenuke Pothinus him selfe. Achillas on thother side, faued him selfe, and fled vnto the kinges F campe, where he rayled a maruelous daugerous & difficult warre for Cafar: bicause he having then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight against a great & strong city. Bur for the king, no man could enertell what became of him after. Thereippon Cafar made Cafar made Chepatra his fifter, Queene of Acres, who being great with childe by him; was floorly Chepara brought to bedde of a fonne, whom the ALEXANDRIANS named Cafarion. From thence he Alegypt went into Syri 14, and for going into Asta, there it was told him that Domisius was operthros caldion, cawon in battell, by Pharmaces, the fonne of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the realme of gote of clos-Powre, with a few men with him and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victor para. fie was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA, & CAPPAD OCIA, but further would O needes attempt to winne ARMENTA the leffe, procuring all those kinges, Princes, and Governors of the prominces thereabouts, to rebell against the Romanes. Thereupon Cafar went thither straight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Phioristes, by the citie of Zera, where he flue his armie, & draue him out of all the realme of Powrz. And bicaufe Cafer ville. he would advertise one of his frendes of the sodainnes of this victorie, he onely wrote three the of hing words into Anitau at Rome: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I faw, I ouercame, Thefethree Cela writin wordes ending all with like found and letters in the Latin, have a certaint Thotogrape, more three modes pleafaunt to the care, then can be well exprelled in any other tongue. After this, he returned without againg into I raise, and came to Rome, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictas tor the seconde time, which office before was never graunted for one whellesteare; but your D him, Then he was chosen Consul for the yeare following. Afterwardes he was very ill spoken of for that his fouldiers in a mutine having flaine two Prestors, Cofcenius, and Galbs, he gave then no other punishment for it, but in Reade of calling them fouldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto cuery one of them, a thow and Drachmas a man, and great possessions in ITALIE, He was much milliked also for the desperate parts and madnes of Dolabella, for the couctoufnes of Antim, for the dronkennes of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pumpeys house be pulled downe and builded up againe, as a thing not bigge enough for him, wherewith the ROMANES were maruelously offended. Cafer knew all this well enough; and would have bene contented to have redreffed them; but to bring his matters to paile he pretended. he was driven to ferue his turne by fuch influmentes. After the battell of Pharfalia, Cate and

E scipio being fled into AFRICKE, king Iuba ioyned with them, & leavied a great puilant armis. Wherefore Cefar determined to make warre with them. & in the midden of winter he tooke his iorney into Store 1. 1. There, bicaufe he would take all hope from his Captaines and foul cafes tome diers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged voor the very fandes by the fea fide. Mile Afficks. and with the next gale of winde that came, he tooke the fea with three thowland footemen, and Sciple. and a few horfemen. Then having out them a land, vhwares to them, he hoyfed fayle againe, to goe fetche the rest of his armie, being afrayed least they should meete with some davinger in passing ouer, and meeting them middle way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was rolde him that his enemies trufted in an anneient Oracle, which fayd, that it was predestined vinto the family of the Scipioss to be conquerors in A PRICKE: either of purpose I to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwife in good earnest to take the benefit of this name (genen by the Oracle) vnto him felfe, in all the skirmilhes & bartells he fought, he gaue the charge of his army, vnto a man of meane quality and accompt, called Scipio Sal-

A and others allowing the other for Catoes fake, Cafar being now returned out of A PRICKE, first

lution, who came of the race of Sopia, ATRICAN, and made him alwayes his Generall when A he fought. For he was effloories compelled to weary and harrie his enemies; for that neither his men in his campe had come enough, nor his beafts forrage, but the fouldiers were driven to take fea weedes, called Alga: and washing away the brackishnes thereof with fresh water putting to it a little crbe called doggestooth) to call it for their horse to cate. For the Nymi DIANS (which are light horsemen, and very ready of service) being a great number together would be on a fodgine in every place, and ipred all the fieldes over thereabout, so that no man durft peepe out of the campe to goe for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were flaging to beholde an African doing notable thinges in dauncing, and playing with the flush they being fet downe quietly to take their pleasure of the viewe thereof, having in the means time geuen their flaues their horfes to hold, the enemies ftealing fodainly vpon them, come passed them in round about, and slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the otheral To that fled, followed them pell mell into their campe. Furthermore had not Cafar him felfe in person, and Asinius Pollio with him gone out of the campe to the rescue, and stayed them that fled : the warre that day had bene ended. There was also an other skirmish where his ene mies had the upper hande, in the which it is reported, that Cafar taking the enlighe bearer by the coller that carried the Eagle in his hande, stayed him by force, and turning his face, tolde him: fee, there be thy enemies. These advantages did lift vp Scipioes hartalost, and gave him corage to hazard battell: and leaving Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Juba on the other hande, both their campes lying neere to other, he did fortifie him felfe by the citie of THAP SAC VS, about the lake to be a fafe refuge for them all in this battell. But whileft he was f bufie intrenching of him felfe, Cafer having marticlous speedily passed through a great contrie full of wod, by bypathes which men would never have miftrufted he stale youn some behinde, and fodamly affailed the other before, fo that he overthrewe them all, and made them flie. Then following this first good bappe he had, he went forthwith to set apon the camped Afranius, the which he tooke at the first onset, and the campe of the NVMIDIANS also, king Tubs being fled. Thus in a little peece of the day only be tooke three campes & flue fifty thom. fand of his enemies, and loft but fifty of his fouldiers. In this forte is fet downe theffect of this battell by some wryters. Yet others doe wryte also, that Casar selfe was not there in person at thexecution of this battell. For as he did fet his men in battell ray, the falling fickeneffe tooke him, whereunto he was geuen, and therefore feeling it comming, before he was ouercome D withall, he was carried into a castell not farre from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his rest till thextremity of his disease had left him. Now, for the Prætors & Confulls that scaped from this battell, many of them being taken prisoners, did kill them selves, and others also Cefar did put to death; but he being specially desirous of all men else to have Cate aliue in his hands, he went with all possible speede vnto the citie of V TICA, whereof Cato was Gouernor, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Notwithstanding being certi-Cefer was for fied by the way that Cato had flaine him felfe with his owne handes, he then made open flow that he was very fory for it, but why or wherfore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cafe fayd at that prefent time: O Cato, I entry thy death, bicause thou diddest entry my glory, to saus thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote afterwardes against Cato being dead, E did shew no very great affection nor pitiefull hart towardes him. For how could be have pardoned him, if living he had had him in his handes; that being dead did speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would have pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the elemencie he shewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and divers others that had borne armes against him. Some reporte, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any private macitero prote lice he had to his death, as for a civil ambition, apon this occasion, Cicero had written a books in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likely hoode was very well liked of by prayed at the print dead, reason of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subject thereof. Celer therewith was maruelously offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death he was author, was even as much as to accuse him self: & therfore he wrote a letter against him, & hea- F ped vp a number of accusations against Cato, and intituled the booke Anticaton. Both these

of all made an oration to the people, wherein he greatly praifed and commended this his last victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered fo many contries vnto the Empire of ROME, that he coulde furnishe the common wealth yearely, with two hundred thowsande buffhells of wheate, & twenty hundred thowfand pound weight of oyle. Then he made three miumphes, the one for AGYPT, the other for the kingdom of PONTE, and the third for A-FRICKE: not bicause he had ouercome Scipia there, but king Iuba. Whose some being likewife called Iuba, being then a young boy, was led captine in the showe of this triumphe. But this his imprisonment fel out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous NVMIDIAN, by the study he fell vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the Inba, the B wifest historiographers of the GRECIANS. After these three triumphes ended, he very libe, some of king rally rewarded his fouldiers: and to curry fauor with the people, he made great feafts & common sportes. For he feasted all the ROMANES at one time, at two and twenty thowsand tables, graphe and gaue them the pleasure to see divers sword players to fight at the sharpe, and battells also casars feaby fea, for the remembraunce of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long afore. Then after Romanes all these sportes, he made the people (as the manner was) to be mustered : and where there The minster were at the last musters before, three hundred and twenty thowsande citizens, at this muster taken of the only there were but a hundred and fifty thowfand. Such mifery and destruction had this civill warre brought vnto the common wealth of Rome, and had confumed fuch a number of Ro-MANES not speaking at all of the mischieues and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of C. ITALIE, and to the other provinces pertaining to ROME. After all these thinges were ended, he was chosen Consul the fourth time, and went into Spayne to make warre with the sonnes cafer consult of Pompey: who were yet but very young, but had notwithstanding raised a maruelous great the fourth army together, and shewed to have had manhoode and corage worthie to commaunde such an armie, infomuch as they put Cafar him felfe in great daunger of his life. The greatest bat- Bastell fought tell that was fought between them in all this warre, was by the citie of MVND A. For then Cat between Catfar and the far feeing his men forely diffressed, and having their hands full of their enemies: he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them : what, are ye not ashamed poor, by the to be beaten and taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your owne handes to these young city of Munboyes? And fo, with all the force he could make, having with much a doe put his enemies to D flight: he flue about thirty thowfand of them in the fielde, and loft of his owne men a thow - cafar vittofand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his frends, that he had my of the often before fought for victory, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his Proper. ownelife. He wanne this battell on the very feast day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of Rome, about four eyeares before, to beginne this civill warre. For his fonnes, the younger fcaped from the battell: but within few dayes after, Diddius brought the heade of the elder. This was the last warre that Cafar made. But the triumphe he made into Rome for the same, did as much offend the Romanes, and more, then sample of any thing that euer he had done before: bicause he had not ouercome Captaines that were Per straungers, nor barbarous kinges, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man in Rome, E whom fortune had ouerthrowen. And bicause he had plucked up his race by the rootes men did not thinke it meete for him to triumphe fo, for the calamities of his contrie, reioycing:at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men: that he was compelled to doe that he did. And the rather they thought it not meete, bicause he had neuer before fent letters nor messengers vnto the common wealth at: Rome, for any victorie that he had euer wonne in all the civill warres: but did alwayes for shame refuse the glorie of it. This notwithstanding, the ROMANES inclining to Cafars prosperity, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for them to take breth a litle, after so many troubles and miseries as they had abidden in these civill warres: they chose him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this ab- casa Dista-

most honor him, they made him hatefull and troublesome to them selves that most favor him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnes and honors which they gaue him. Thereupper it is reported, that even they that most hated him, were no lesse favorers and furtherers of him. honors, then they that most flattered him: bicause they might have greater occasions to risk and that it might appeare they had just cause and colour to attempt that they did against him And now for him felfe, after he had ended his civill warres, he did so honorably behave him felfe, that there was no fault to be founde in him: and therefore me thinkes, amongest other The temple of honors they gave him, he rightly deserved this, that they should builde him a temple of the clemency, de mency, to thanke him for his curtefie he had vied vnto them in his victorie. For he pardond Cefar, for his many of them that had borne armes against him, and furthermore, did preferre some of them to honor and office in the common wealth: as amongest others, Cassius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwen downe, he caused them to be fet vp againe: whereupon Cicero fayd then that Cafar fetting vp Pompeys images & gaine, he made his owne to stand the furer. And when some of his frends did counsell himm haue a gard for the fafety of his person, and some also did offer them selues to serue him; he cefar sying would neuer consent to it, but sayd, it was better to dye once, then alwayes to be affrayed of good will of death. But to win him felfe the loue and good will of the people, as the honorablest gard and Subjectes, the best safety he could have the made common feasts againe, & generall distributions of come; Furthermore, to gratifie the fouldiers also, he replenished many cities againe with inhabitantes, which before had bene deftroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire VINTO: of the which the nobleft & chiefest cities were these two, CARTHAGE, & CORINTHE C and it chaunced fo, that like as aforetime they had bene both taken and destroyed together. euen so were they both set a soote againe, and replenished with people, at one selfetime. And as for great personages, he wanne them also, promising some of them, to make them Prætors and Confulls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferrements, but to all menges nerally good hope, feeking all the wayes he coulde to make euerie man contented with his raigne. Infomuch as one of the Confulls called Maximus, chauncing to dye a day before his Caninius Re- Confulfhippe ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Confull onely for the day that remained, So, divers going to his house (as the manner was) to salute him, & to congratulate with him of his calling and preferrement, being newly chosen officer: Cicero pleasauntly sayd, come, let vs make halt, and be gone thither, before his Confulshippe come out. Furthermore, Ca. D. far being borne to attempt all great enterprises, & having an ambitious desire besides to couet great honors: the prosperous good successe he had of his former conquestes bred no defire in him quietly to enjoy the frutes of his labours, but rather gaue him hope of thinges to come, still kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterprises, and defire of new glory, as if that which he had present, were stale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with him felfe as with an other man, and a certaine contencionto ouercome the thinges he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, & made preparacion alfo, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had ouercome them, to paffe through HYRCANIA (compaffing in the sea Caspium, and mount Caucasus) into the realme of Pon-TVS, and so to inuade Scythia: and outrrunning all the contries and people adjoyning E unto high GERMANY, and GERMANY it felfe, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALIE, and so to enlarge the Romane Empire round, that it might be every way compassed in with the great fea Oceanum. But whileft he was preparing for this voiage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of Peloponnes.vs, in the place where the city of Corinthe standeth. Then he was mit. ded to bring the rivers of Anienes and Tiber, straight from Rome, vnto the citie of CLACERS, with a deepe channell and high banckes cast up on either side, and so to fall into the sea at Terracina, for the better safety and commodity of the marchants that came to Rome to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and seawe all the water of the marifles between the cities of Nomentym and Setium, to make it firme land, for the benefit of many thowfandes of people : and on the fea coast next vnto Rome, to cast great F high bankes, and to clense all the hauen about Osria, of rockes and stones hidden under the water, and to take away all other impedimentes that made the harborough daungerous

A his thippes, and to make new hauens and artenalls meete to harbor fuch thippes. 2s did conmually trafficke thither. All these thinges were purposed to be done, but tookeno effecte. But, the ordinaunce of the kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion cafe refor oftime, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a medite me great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMANES vling then the auncient computation of the yeare, had not only such incertainty and alteracion of the moneth and times, that the sacrifices and yearely feasts came by litle and litle to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the revolution of the sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the Romanes them selues, only the priests underfood it. And therefore when they lifted, they fodainly (no man being able to controll them) R did thrust in a moneth, about their ordinary number, which they called in old time. * Merce- "Mercedodonius. Some fay, that Numa Pompilius was the first, that deuised this way, to put a moneth interculorie hetwene: but it was a weake remedy, and did litle helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cafar committing this matter vnto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time, did set foorth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMANES doe vie vntill this present day, and doe nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithstanding that enuied his greatnes, did not sticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one fayd, to morow the starre Lyra will rife: wea, layd he, at the commaundement of Cafar, as if men were compelled to to fay and thinke, VVhy Cafa C by Cafars edict. But the chiefest cause that made him mortally hated, was the couetous desire he had to be called king: which first gaue the people iust cause, and next his secret enemies, honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this honor & dignity, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybilline prophecies, how the ROMANES might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwise that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold belides, that Cafar returning to ROME from the citie of ALBA, when they came to falute him. they called him king. But the people being offended, and Calar also angry, he faid he was not called king, but Cafar. Then every man keeping filence, he went his way heavy and forowfull. When they had decreed divers honors for him in the Senate, the Consults and Prætors acn companied with the whole affembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was fet by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his ablence. But he fitting still in his maiesty, disdaining to rife vp vito them when they came in, as if they had bene private men, aunswered them : that his honors had more neede to be cut of then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the common wealth: insomuch as euery man that might lawfully goe his way, departed thence very forrowfully. Thereupon also Cefar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his doblet coller, making his necko bare, he cried out alowde to his frendes, that his throte was readie to offer to any man than would come and cut it. Notwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwardes to excuse this folly, he imputed it to his disease, faying, that their wittes are not perfit which have his disease of the falling euil, when standing of their feete they speake to the common people, but are soone troubled with a trembling of their body, and a fodaine dimnes and guidines. But that was nor true. For he would haue risen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his frendes i but rather a flatterer) would not let him, faying : what, doe you not remember that you are Cafar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and doe their dueties? Besides these occasions and offences, therefollowed also his shame and reproache, abusing the Tribunes of the people

ANS in ARCADIA, But howefocuer it is, that day there are divers noblement formes, young Fmen (and some of them Magistrats them selves that governe then) which run naked through the city, striking in sport them they meete in their way, with leather thonges, heare and all on, to make them geue place. And many noble women, and gentle women also, goe of purpose in this forte. At that time, the feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in olde time men The feast lay was the feast of the apheards or heard men, and is much like vnto the feast of the Lyc & t- Impresalisa

792 to stand in their way, and doe put forth their handes to be striken, as schollers hold theman to their schoolemaster, to be striken with the ferula: perswading them selues that being childe, they shall have good deliverie, and also being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with child, Cafar fate to beholde that sport apon the pulpit for orations, in a chaver of gold, apparelled in triumphing manner. Antonius, who was Confull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy course. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cafar, and presented him a Diadeame wrea. thed about with laurell. Whereuppon there rose a certaine crie of reioycing, not very great done onely by a few, appointed for the purpole, But when Cafar refused the Diadeame, then all the people together made an outcrie of ioy. Then Antonism offering it him againe, there was a second shoute of ioy, but yet of a few. But whe Cafar refused it agains the second time, then all the whole people thowted. Cafar having made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereuppon rose out of his chayer, and commaunded the crowne to becaried vnto Impiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were fet vp images of Cafar in the city with Diadeames vpon their heades, like kinges. Those, the two Tribunes, Flavius and Marulla. went and pulled downe : and furthermore, meeting with them that first saluted Casar as king they committed them to prison. The people followed them reioyeing at it, and called them Brutes: bicause of Brutus, who had in old time driven the kings out of Rome, & that brought the kingdom of one person, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Casar was soof fended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneshippes, and accusing them, he spake also against the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to witte, beaftes, and fooles. Hereuppon the people went straight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the first Brutus, and by his mother, of the house of the Seruilians, a noble house as any was in Rome, and was also nephew and sonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honors and fauor Cafar thewed vnto him, kept him backe that of him felfe alone, he did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his kingdom. For Casar did not onely sauchis life, after the battell of Pharfalia when Pompey fled, and did at his request also faue many moe of his frendes besides: but furthermore, he put 2 maruelous considence in him. For he had the barrel of already preferred him to the Prætorshippe for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Conful, the fourth yeare after that, having through Cafars frendshippe, obtained it before

Cassim, who likewise made sute for the same: and Casar also, as it is reported, sayd in this con-

this effect. Thou fleepest Brutus, and art not Brutus in deede. Cassus finding Brutus ambition tention, in deede Castius hath alleaged best reason, but yet shall he not be chosen before Brutus. Some one day accusing Brutus while he practifed this conspiracy, Cafar would not heate of it, but clapping his hande on his bodie, told them, Brutus will looke for this skinne: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue, descrued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions chaunge, and wished Brutus only their Prince and Gouernour aboue all other: they durst not come to him them selves to tell him what they woulde have him to doe, but in the night did cast fundrie papers into the Prætors seate where he gaue audience, and the most of them to more, for a private quarrell he had conceived against Cafar: the circumstance whereof, we haue sette downe more at large in Brutus life. Casar also had Cassius in great gelouzie, and suspected him much : whereuppon he sayed on a time to his frendes, what will Cassius doe, thinke ye? I like not his pale lookes. An other time when Calars frendes complained ynto him of Antonius, and Dolabella, that they pretended fome mischiefe towardes him: he aunswered them againe, as for those fatte men and smooth comed heades, o he, I neuer reckon of them: but these pale visaged and carian leane people, I feare them most, meaning Brutus and Cassius. Certainly, destenie may easier be foreseene, then anoyded: considering the straunge & wonderfull fignes that were fayd to be seene before Cafars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and spirites running vp and downe in the night, and also these solitarie birdes to be F seene at noone dayes fittinge in the great market place: are not all these signes perhappes worth the noting, in such a wonderfull chaunce as happened. But Strabe the Philosopher

A wryteth, that divers men were seene going vp and downe in fire : and surthermore, that there was a flaue of the fouldiers, that did cast a maruelous burning slame out of his hande_infomuch as they that faw it, thought he had bene burnt, but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cafar felfe also doing facrifice vnto the goddes, found that one of the beaftes which was facrificed had no hart: and that was a straunge thing in nature, how a Beast could line without a hart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothfayer that had geuen Cafar war- cafaridar of ning long time affore, to take heede of the day of the Ides of Marche, (which is the fifteenth his death proof the moneth) for on that day he shoulde be in great daunger. That day beng come, Cafar a southly on going vnto the Senate house, and speaking merily to the Soothsayer, tolde him, the Ides of Marche be come : fo be they, foftly aunswered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past, And B the very day before, Cafar fupping with Marcus Lepidus, sealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the bord: fo talke falling out amongest them, reasoning what death was best: he prenenting their opinions, cried out alowde, death vnlooked for. Then going to bedde the fame night as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windowes and dores of his

but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being fast a sleepe, weepe and figh, and put forth The dreame many fumbling lamentable speaches. For she dreamed that Cafar was slaine, and that she cafar wife. had him in her armes. Others also doe denie that she had any suche dreame, as amongest other, Titus Linius wryteth, that it was in this forte. The Senate hauing fet vpon the toppe of Cafars house, for an ornament and setting foorth of the same, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia C dreamed that the fawe it broken downe, and that the thought the lamented and wept for it. Infomuch that Cafar rifing in the morning, the prayed him if it were possible, not to goe out of the dores that day, but to adjorne the session of the Senate, untill an other day. And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he woulde fearche further of the Soothfayers by their facrifices, to knowe what should happen him that day. Thereby it seemed that Cafar likewise did feare and suspect somewhat, bicause his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer geuen to any feare or supersticion: and then, for that he saw her so troubled in minde with this dreame she had. But much more afterwardes, when the Soothsayers having sacrificed many beaftes one after an other, tolde him that none did like them: then he determined to fende Antonius to adiorne the session of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Bru-D tus, furnamed Albinus, in whom Cafar put fuch confidence, that in his last will and testament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conspiracie with Cassus and Decim Bris-Brutus: he fearing that if Cafar did adiorne the session that day, the conspiracie woulde out, laughed the Soothfayers to scorne, and reproued Casar, saying: that he gaue the Senate occafion to mislike with him, and that they might thinke he mocked them, considering that by his commaundement they were affembled, and that they were readie willingly to graunt him all thinges, and to proclaime him king of all the provinces of the Empire of Rome out of I-TALIE, and that he should weare his Diadeame in all other places, both by sea and land. And furthermore, that if any man should tell them from him, they should departe for that present time, and returne againe when Calpurnia shoulde haue better dreames: what would his ene-E mies and ill willers fay, and how could they like of his frendes wordes? And who could perfwade them otherwise, but that they would thinke his dominion a slauerie vnto them, and tirannicall in him felfe? And yet if it be so, sayd he, that you veterly mislike of this day, it is better that you goe your selfe in person, and saluting the Senate, to dismisse them till another time. Therewithall he tooke Cafar by the hand, and brought him out of his house. Cafar was Decim Brunot gone farre from his house, but a bondman, a straunger, did what he could to speake with tue brought him: and when he sawe he was put backe by the great prease and multitude of people that Senate house. followed him, he went straight vnto his house, and put him selfe into Calpurniaes handes to be The sokins of kept, till Casar came backe againe, telling her that he had great matters to imparte vnto him. And one Artemidorus also borne in the Te of GNIDOS, a Doctor of Rethoricke in the Greeke Cafe. F tongue, who by meanes of his profession was verie familliar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the most parte of all their practises against Cafar: came & brought him a little bill wrytten with his owne hand, of all that he ment to tell him. He marking howe

his gowne ouer his heade, and made no more refistaunce, and was driven either casually, or purposedly, by the counsell of the conspirators, against the base whereupon Pompeys image. stoode, which ranneall of a goare bloude, till he was slaine. Thus it seemed, that the image tooke just reuenge of Pompeys enemie, being throwen downe on the ground at his feete, and yelding up his ghost there, for the number of wounds he had upon him. For it is reported that he had three and twenty wounds apon his body: and divers of the conspirators did hurt them felues, striking one body with so many blowes. When Cafar was slaine, the Senate (though Brutus flood in the middest amongest them as though he would have fayd somwhat touching this fact) presently ran out of the house, and flying, filled all the city with maruelous seare and E tumult. Infomuch as fome did shut to their dores, others for sooke their shops & warehouses, and others ranne to the place to see what the matter was : and others also that had feene it, Cafar received all the supplications that were offered him, and that he gauethem straightm. his men that were about him, pressed neerer to him, and sayed : Cafar, reade this memorial to your felfe, and that quickely, for they be matters of great waight and touche you nectely Cafar tooke it of him, but could never reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did falute him : but holding it still in his hande, keeping it to him felfe, went on withall into the Senate house. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was former man else that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to geue it Casar, but he was alwayes repulsed by the people. For these things they may seeme to come by chaunce : but the place where the murther was prepared, and where the Senate were affembled, and where also there stoode vp an image of Pompey dedicas ted by him felfe amongest other ornamentes which he gaue vnto the Theater: all these were R manifest proofes that it was the ordinaunce of some god, that made this treason to be exe cuted, specially in that verie place. It is also reported, that Cassius (though otherwise he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterprise : he did softely call vponit, to aide him. But the inflame dauger of the present time, taking away his former reason, did sodainly put him into a furious passion, and made him like a man halfe besides him selse. Now Antonius, that was a faithfull frende to Cafar, and a valliant man besides of his handes, him, Decius Brutus Albinus enten tained out of the Senate house, having begon a long tale of set purpose. So Casar comming into the house, all the Senate stoode vp on their feete to doe him honor. Then parte of Bratus companie and confederates stoode rounde about Cesars chayer, and parte of themalie (came towardes him, as though they made fute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from banishment: and thus prosecuting still their sute, they followed Casar, till he was fet in his chayer. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after an other, bicause the more they were denied, the more they pressed upon him, and were the earnester with him : Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his handes, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the figne genen the confederates to fette apon him. Then Calca mortall, bicause it seemed, the feare of such a deuelishe attempt did amaze him, and take his strength from him, that he killed him not at the first blowe. But Casar turning straight vnto him, caught hold of his fword, and held it hard : and they both cried out, Cafar in Latin: O D vile traitor Casea, what doest thou? And Casea in Greeke to his brother, brother, helpe me. At the beginning of this sturre, they that were present, not knowing of the conspiracie were fo amazed with the horrible fight they fawe: that they had no power to flie, neither to helpe him, not so much, as once to make any outcrie. They on thother side that had conspired his death, compassed him in on eueric side with their swordes drawen in their handes, that Cafer turned him no where, but he was striken at by some, and still had naked swords in his face, and was hacked and mangeled amonge them, as a wilde beafte taken of hunters. For it was agreed among them, that every man should geve him a wound, bicause all their partes should be in this murther: and then Brutus him felfe gaue him one wounde about his privities. Men reporte also, that Cafar did still defende him selfe against the rest, running euerie waye with E his bodie: but when he fawe Brutus with his fworde drawen in his hande, then he bulled is ran home to their houses againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two office line chiefest frends, secretly conveying them selves away, fled titto other mens houses, and for sooke their owne. Brutus and his confederats on thother fide, being yet hotte with this hauther they had The market committed, having their fwordes drawen in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of resoft after the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made dountenaunce to flie, but Com otherwise boldly holding up their heades like men of corage, and called to the people to defende their libertie, and stayed to speake with enery great personage who met he their way. Of them, fome followed this troupe, and went amongest them, as if they had bene of the conspiracie, and fallely chalenged parte of the honor with them among them was care Offauius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their value R couctouines of honor, by Antonius, and Octavius Cafar the younger: and yet had no parte of that honor for the which they were put to death, neither did any man beloue that they were any of the confederates, or of councell with them. For they that did put them to death tooke reuenge rather of the will they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus and his confederates came into the market place to speake visto the people. who gave them fuch audience, that it feemed they neither greatly reproued morallowed the fact : for by their great filence they showed, that they were fory for Cafars death and also that they did reuerence Brutus. Nowethe Senate graunted generall pardonne for all that was paste, and to pacific every man; ordained besides, that Cafars suneralls shoulde bee honored as a god, and established all thinges that he had done: and gaug certaine provinces also and O convenient honors vnto Britte and his confederates, whereby every man thought all things were brought to good peace & quietnes againe. But when they had opened en testamet. Cefarfuneand found a liberall legacie of money, bequeathed vnto enery citizen of Ro iest and that they faw his body (which was brought into the market place) al bemangled with galhes of fwords:

then there was no order to keepe the multitude and common people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, and stooles, and layed them all about the body, & setting them a fire burnt the corfe. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the firebrandes, and went vnto their houses that hadslaine Cesar, to set them a fire. Other also rannevp and downe the citie to fee if they could meete with any of them, to cut them in peeces: how beit they could meete with neuer a man of them, bicause they had tocked them selues vp safely in their houses. D There was one of Cafars frends called Cinna, that had a maruelous straunge & terrible dreame cinnaes the night before. He dreamed that Cefar bad him to supper, & that he resused, and would not cefar. goe: then that Cafar tooke him by the hand, and led him against his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cafars body in the market place, notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an agew on him befides: he went into the market place to honor his funeralls. When he came thither, one of the meane forte asked what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to an other, and that other vnto an other, so that it ranne straight through them all, that he was one of them that murdered Cafar: (for in deede one of the traitors to Cafar, was also called Cinna as him selfe) wherefore taking him for The musher Cinna the murderer, they fell vpon him with such furie, that they presently dispatched him in of Cinna. E the market place. This sturre and furie made Brutus and Cassius more affrayed, then of all that was past, and therefore within fewe dayes after, they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamity they suffered till their deathes, we have wrytten it at large, in the life of Brutus. Cafar dyed at fix and fifty yeres of age: and Pompey also lived not Cafar 56 years passing source yeares more then he. So he reaped no other frute of all his raigne & dominion, death, which he had so vehemently defired all his life, and pursued with such extreame daunger:but a vaine name only, and a superficiall glory, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his contrie. But his great prosperitie and good fortune that fauored him all his leetime, did continue The remente

F spiracy of his death. Furthermore, of all the chaunces that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Cassius about all other, is most to be wondred at. For he being outcome Cassius being in battell at the iorney of Philippes, flue him felfe with the fame sworde, with the which he

strake Calar. Againe, of signes in the element, the great comet which seuen nightes together A was seene very bright after Cafars death, the eight night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnes of the funne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and this ned not out, whereby it gaue but small heate: therefore the ayer being very clowdy & darke. by the weakenes of the heate that could not come foorth, did cause the earth to bring foorth but raw and vnrype frute, which rotted before it could rype. But aboue all, the ghost that anpeared vnto Brutus shewed plainly, that the goddes were offended with the murther of Cafar. The vision was thus. Brutus being ready to passe ouer his army from the citie of ABYDOS, to the other coast lying directly against it, slept every night (as his manner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by reporte he was as carefull a Captaine, and lived with as little fleepe, as ever man did) he thought he heard a noyfe at his tent dore, & look, R ing towards the light of the lampe that waxed very dimme, he faw a horrible vision of a man. of a wonderfull greatnes, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him maruelously afraid. But when he fawe that it did him no hurt, but stoode by his bedde side, and sayd nothing ; at length he asked him what he was. The image aunswered him: I am thy ill angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Then Brutus replied againe, and sayd: well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him. After that time Brutus being in battell neere vnto the citic of PHILIPPES, against Antonius and Octavius Cafar, at the first battell he wan the victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstoode him, he draue them into young Cafars campe, which he tooke. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared again vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereuppon Brutus knowing he should dye, did put him selfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be flaine. So feeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowen he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre of, and there fetting his fwordes point to his breft, fell vpon it, and flue him selfe, but yet as it is reported, with the helpe of his frend, that dispatched him.

A Destination of the Common of

He Orator Demades on a time florished in ATHENS, bicause in all his doings and fayings in the administration and gouernment of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the MACEDONIAN'S and Antipater: in respect whereof he was efficiences compelled, both in his counsell. and lawes, to preferre many things to the diffionor of his city, laying, that they must pardon him bicaule he gouerned the shippewrackes of Demade are his contrie. This was an arrogant speache : but yet referring it to the rogat faying. gouernment of Phocion he fayd truely. For in deede Demades felfe was the (hippewracke of the common weale, bicause he lined so insolently, and gouerned so lewdly. Insomuch as Antipater sayd of him, after he was very old : that there B was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaft facrificed, but the tongue and belly, But the vertues of Phocton, which had to fight against the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were lo obscured by the calamities of GR E CEthat his fame was nothing so great as he described. For we must not credit Sophoeles words, making vertue of it selfe but weake, in these verses, When stormes of fore aduersities (o king) doe men affaile, vertuous men, her force is so great, that where they deserve honor, and favor, the violently former. heapeth falle & malicious accusations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, & not of that credit which in dede it descrueth. And yet it seemeth to many, that free cities are most C cruel vnto their good citizens in time of prosperity: bicause they flow in wealth & line at case, which maketh them of hauty mindes. But it is cleane contrary. For adjustify commonly many maketh mens maners fower, chollericke, and very hafty: besides, slow to heare, churlish, and of maketh mens fended with enery litle (harpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend seemeth to call their advertitie in their teeth : and he that telleth them plainly of their faultes, feemeth alfo to despise them. For like as honnie sweete by nature, applied vnto woundes, doth bring both fmart and paine; even so, harpe wordes, though profitable, doe bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with discretion & curtesie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth swete.

It dauntes their corage, cuts their combs, and makes their harts to quails. But we must onely geue place to fortune, who when the frowneth vppon any good and The power of

and pleasaunt thinges usroless, as yeelding and not striuing with contrariety, against that parte A of the minde, whereby we be angrie and froward. For euen as fore eyes doe like to looke on blacke and darke colours, and can not abide the bright and glaring: fo in a city, where for want of forefight and gouernment, things goe not well, men be so divers and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and estate, that they had rather continue in their follie and daunger, then by sharpnes of words to be rebuked and restored. So that it being impossible to amend one fault with a greater, that common wealth must be in great daunger, that when it hath most nede of helpe, is lothest to receive any: and he also hazardeth him selfe, that plainly telleth them their faultes. Like as therefore the Mathematician fayth, that the funne doth not altogether follow the motion of the highest heaven, nor yet is moved directly contrary, but setching a compase a little ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approching and departing pre- R ferueth all things, & kepeth the world in good temperature. Euen fo, too feuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as also it is maruelous daungerous, not to correct offendors when they offend, for feare of the peoples displeasure. But the meane. fometime to yeelde vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to graunt them things of pleasure, to demaund of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to doe many profitable things, when they seeke it not of them, by rigor & authority. In deede this meane is very hard to be observed, bicause authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more muficall, nor concordance more perfit then that and therfore it is faid, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced C obediece in men. But this fault of seuerenes was in Cato the younger, for he could not fashion him felfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like his:neither did he win his estimacion in the common wealth by flattering of them. And therefore Cicero fayd, that he was put by the Confulthip, for that he behaued him felfe as though he liued in the common wealth deuised by Plato, & not amongest the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romalus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely frute: the which though men doe take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen fo, the auncient fimplicity of Catoes maner (hauing fo long time bene out of vie, & comming then to shew it selfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was in deede much praiseworthy: but yet not the conuenientest, nor the fittest for him, bicause it aunswered nor respected not the vie and maners of his time. For he found not I his contry (as Phocion did) vtterly destroyed, but to fied in a daungerous tempest: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the sterne in hand, & gouerne the shippe: he tooke him selse to tricking the failes, and preparing the tacle, so to affilt men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he fo thwarted fortune (which feemed to have fworne the ouerthrowe of the estate of Rome) that with much a doe, with great difficulty, & a long time after, the executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato & his vertue: with whom I doe compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion, were not in all thinges alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is difference between manhood & manhood, as there was between that of Alcibiades, and that of Epaminondas: between wisedom & wisedom, as between that of Aristides, & that of Themisto- E cles: & betwext iustice & iustice, as betwext that of Numa, & that of Agesilans. But the vertues of these men(to him that shall superficially regard, & slightly consider them) seeme all one in quality, in maner, & vse, both alike in temperance of curtesie with seuerity. & manhood with wisdom: a vigilant care for others, with presence of corage & security of mind for them selues, abhorring all filthines & corruption, & imbraling coltancy & loue of iuftice: that for any man to discerne the difference between the, it requireth an excellent good wit & judgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we wil shew you hereafter The pariese in his life; but for Phocion, I geffe he came of no base parentage. For if he had bene the sonne of aspoonemaker, as Idomeneus testifieth: Glaucippus the sonne of Hyperides, having in an invective he wrote against him, rehersed all the mischieses he could of him, he would not have forgotte p to haue vpbraid him with his base paretage, neither he him self also (if that had bene true) had bene fo well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a young man, he was Platoes scholler,

N and afterwards Xenocrates scholler, in the schoole of Academia: and so, even from his first beginning, he gauchim selse to followe them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer A- Phochen ne-THENIAN faw him weepe nor laugh, nor washe him selfe in any common bathe, nor his hands wer weeps, nor out of his sleenes when he ware a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwaies goe afoote, and neuer wore gowne, vnles it were extreame cold: and then the fouldiers to mocke him withall, would fay it was a figne of a sharpe winter, when they sawe Phocion in his gowne. Nowe, though in deede he was very curteous and gentle of nature, yet he had Photions mafuch a grymme looke withall, that no man had any defire to talke with him . but fuch as were of his familliar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocked him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My Maifters, p. Phocion, the bending of my browes have done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of these flatterers, haue made ye oftentymes to weepe. Furthermore, his maner of speech was very profitable, for the good fentences and counfells he vttered: but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnes. For as Zeno the Philosopher sayeth, that the wise man should temper his wordes with witte and reason, before he vtter them: euen so was Phocions freech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it feemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN fayd, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech, Phocion was very wittie. For like as coynes of gold or filuer, the lighter they waye, the finer they be of goodnes: even so the excellencie of speeche consisteth in signifying much, by fewe wordes. Prhenimen. And touching this matter, it is reported, that the Theater being full of people, Phoeion walked cellmin of all alone vpon the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with him selfe: such. whereuppon, one of his friendes feeing him fo in his muses, said vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy minde is occupied about somewhat. In deede so is it, sayd he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I have to fay to the people. For Demosthenes selfe little esteming all other Orators, when Photion rose vp to speake, he would round his friendes in their eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my wordes rifeth. Peraduenture he ment it by his maners also: For when a good man speaketh, not a word onely, but a wincke of an eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words & speeches of Rethoritians, Furthermore, Phocion first when he was a young man, he went to the warres vnder Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: fouldier fare. of whom he learned to be a perfit fouldier, and in recompence thereof, he reformed many of D his Captaines imperfections, and made him wifer then he was. For Chabrias otherwise beeing very dull and flothfull of him selse, when he came to fight, he was so hotte and corageous, that he would thrust himselse into daunger, with the desperatest persons: & therefore for his rashnes, it afterwards cost him his life, in the citie of CH10, where launching out with his gally before the rest, he pressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wise to loke to him felfe, and very quicke to execute: on the one fide quickned Chabrias flownes, and on the other fide alfo, by wifedom cooled his heateand furie. Chabrias therefore, being a good man & curteous, loued Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of feruice, making him famous amongest the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardiest enterprises. For by his meanes he atchieued great same and honor in a battell by sea, which he wanne by the Ileof Naxos, E giuing him the left winge of his armie: on which fide the fight was sharpest of all the battell, The wifter, guing nim the left winge of its at the color of which the citie of A- of Chabrids and there he foonest put the enemies to flight. This battel being the first which the citie of A- and Phoeism, THEN'S Wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cause to in the He of loue Chabrias, and made them also to make accompt of Phoeion, as of a noble fouldier, & wor- Nexus. thy to have charge. This victory was gotten on the feast day of the great misteries, in memory whereof, Chabrias did yearly, on the fixtenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called August) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time, Chabrias sending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders, their confederats, and the shippes which they should fend him: he gaue him twenty gallies to bringe him thither, But Photion then (as it is reported) faid vnto him: if he fent him to fight with his enemies, he had neede to have moe shippes: but if he F sent him as an Ambassador vnto his friendes, then, that one shippe would serue his turne. So he went with one gallie onely: and after he had spoken with the cities, and curteously dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their confederats, XXX iii with a great fleete of shipper and money to cary vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely in A uerence Chabrias while he lived, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friendes and kinfmen, and fought to make his fonne Ctelippus, an honest man; whom, though he fawe year. wilde and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is fayde also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous questions, serving then you der him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counsell, to reproue him, and to teache him the dutie of a Captaine: he could not but fay, O Chabrias, Chabrias: now doe! paye for the loue thou dideft beare me when thou wert alue, in bearing with the folly of the fonne. But when he saw that the heads of the citie of A THEN'S had as it were by lot deuided an monge them selves the offices of warre and peace, and that some of them, as Eubulus, Ariffo. phon, Demost thenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common speakers and preferrers of matters in R counfells and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Menestheus, Leosthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment, of Pericles, Ariftides, & Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them. seemed (as the Poet Archilocus fayth)

He knew also, that Pallas the goddesse and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, having thus disposed of him felfein gouernment, he alwaies perswaded peace and quietnes, and yet was often chosen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his C time, did neuer fue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serue the common wealth. It is certen that he was chosen fine and forty times Prator, and was alwaies absent at the elections, but yet sent for . Whereuppon all the wife men wondred to see the manner of the people towards him, confidering that Phocion had never done nor fayd any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene against their desires: and how they ve fed other gouernours notwithstanding, that were more pleasant and delightfull in their orations, like men to sport at, as it is fayd of kings, who after they have washed their handes to goe to their meate doe vie to have Ieilers and flatterers to make them mery: but on thother lide when they had occasion of warres in deede, how then like wife men they could bethinke them felues, and choose the wifest and stowtest man of the citie, & that most would withstand their II Photions no- mindes and defires. For on a time an oracle of Apollo Delphias, beeing openly red before them, table fayings. which fayd, that all the other Athenians being agreed, yet there was one amonge them that was contrary to all the rest of the citie: Phocion stepping forth before them all, bad them neuer feeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chaunced to fay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praifed and approued but he faw they were to fodeinly become of his minde, he turned backe to his friendes, and asked them: alas, hath not some euill thing slipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towardes the folemnizing of a factifice: other men of his estate having payd their part, he was often also called vpon to pay his! But he aunswered them againe, aske them that be rich, for it were a shame for me to give your E any thing, being yet in this mans debt: pointing to Callieles the Vierer, who had lent him mos ney. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out apon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: that on a time there was a coward preparing to goe to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the Rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for at ill figne, he put of his harnes, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnes againe, & went on his way towards the campe: the Rauens beganne againe to make a goodlier cry beg hind him. But thereuppon he staied straight, and at length fayd: ye shall crooke as lowd as ye lift, before ye feede of my carkas. An other time the ATHENIANS being in warre under his charge, would needes have him to leade them to give charge vppon their enemies, but he would not: thereuppon they called him coward, and layd he durft not. Well fayd he agains? I it is not you can make me valiant, no more then my felfe can make you cowards: and yet one of vs know an other. Another time in a maruelous daungerous time, the people handled him

A very churlifhly, and would needes have him prefently deliver accompt of his charge: but he aunswered them, O my friendes, first saue your selues . Furthermore, the people beeing very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres: and presently in peace againe waxing braue in wordes against Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victorie out of their handes: he onely fayd this to them, you are happy that haue a Captaine that knowes you, els you would finge a new fonge. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOBOTIANS, and them, ahour their bounds and fronters: the which they would not try by lawe, but by battel. But Phacion told them, they did they wift not what, & counselled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the stronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they so much misliked his opinion in the assembly, that they woulde not abide to heare B him, nor fuffer him to speake. Wel, my Maisters, op he then, you may make me doe that which is not to be done: but you shall neuer compell me, against my minde, to say that which is not to be spoken. He would as gallantly also gird the Orators his aduersaries, when they were but fie with him. As on a time he aunswered Demosthenes, that fayd vnto him: the people, Phocion, will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heades. Yea thee, o he, if they be wife. Agayne, when Polyeuctus Sphettian, in a hotte day perswaded the people of Athens to make warre with king Philip, sweating, and with much a doe fetching his breath, being a fatte man, that he was driven oftentymes to drinke water, to ende his oration: furely fayd Phocion, ye shall doe maruelous wifely, to make warre at such a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he doe, when he hath his curats and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that onowin making an oration onely before you, which he hath studied long before, is almost stifled? Another time also whe Lycurgus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the rest, for that Alexander demaunding tenne Citizens of A-THEN S to do with them what he thought good, that he had counselled them to deliuer them: Phocion aunswered him, I have often times counselled them for the best, but they would never follow my councell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeated the LACED & MONIAN, with a maruelous long beard, a beggerly cloke, and a fower looke. Phot cion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witnes, to confirme that he spake. But he rising vp, counselled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall, Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and fayd vnto him: alas Archibiades, why diddelt D thou not then clippe thy beard, seeing thou wouldest needes flatter? There was another great Arifogion, a pleader, one Ariflogiton, that in all affemblies of the citie, did nothing but buffe warres contin nually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and mustered, and their names entred that should goe to the warres: Aristogiton came halting into the market place with a staffe in his hand, and both his legges bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was sicke and diffeafed. Phocion fpying Arifogiton farre of, cryed out to the Clearke that wrote the bills: put in Ariftogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentymes it makes me mule, howe, or where, fore so sharpe and seuere a man (as by these examples it appeareth he was) could come to the furname of good. Notwithstanding, in the ende I find it a hard thing, but not impossible, that Photien calnumame of good. Notwithitanding, in the cities I minite a natu timing, out of the contra; led by fire-aman should be like wine, both sweete and sharpe together: as there are others to the contra; name, good. E ry, that at the first fight, seeme very curteous and gentle of conuersation, and apon better acquaintance, proue churlishe and dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should fay to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my sharpenes, but confider if my sharpenes be without profit. As who should say, men were not trouble som, but for couetouines onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of infolencie & malice did abuse & contemne their authority. Phoeion on thother side; heneuer did Citizen hurt, for any private malice he bare him : but was ever sharpe and cruell to them, which was against any matter he preferred for the benefit of the commonwealth. For in all other things. he shewedhim self matuelous lowly and cutteous to enery body, and would be familiar with his aduerfaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwise in datinger of displeasing F with the state. Infomuch as his friendes therefore reproued him on a time, when he spake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O, fayd he, honest men needeno helpe. An other time, Ariffogiton the Sycophant, beeing clapped up in prison, sent vitto Phocian to pray him to

though his friendes perswaded him the contrary, and aunswered them: O let me alone saw he for where could I fee Ariflogiton more gladly then in prison? Furthermore, when there went any army to fea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen generall but Phocion : the townes and Handes all alongest the sea coast, (which were friendes and confederats of the A. THENIANS) fortified their walls, filled up their hauens, and brought their wives, flaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, & open warre proclaimed, Contrarily also, if Phocion had bene Capteine and generall: they would fend out their shippes to the seato meete him farre of, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and so would bringe him to their cities. King Philip secretly seking to winne the Ile of Ev-BOEA, sent an armie thither out of MACEDON, and intised the townes by tyrannes to rebell: R whereuppon, Platarke ERETRIAN praied in ayde of the ATHENIANS, to take this Lland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not presently to Phocion ior ayde them So Phocion was fent general thither, but with a fewe men onely, bicaufe they made account the men of that contry would straight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebells, and brybed with kine Philippes money, which he lauished out amonge them: so that he was brought into great daunger. Thereupon he retyred to a litle hill that is feuered from the fieldes of Tamynes, with a great large valley, and there fortified him felfe with that litle armie he had. Then he perswaded his Captaines notto care for all those rebels, pratiers, and cowards which fled out of their Phocien perfradeth bis tents, and for fooke their enfignes and Captaines, but that they should let them goe out of the c campe where they would. For, fayd he, fuch disobedient souldiers here will doe vs no service. imous fauldiand moreouer will hinder them that have good will to ferue well: and at home also knowing them selves in faulte, for that they for sooke the campe without licence, they dare not comto depart the playne apon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to fet apon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put them selues in readines, and not to sturre, vntill he had done sacrifice: but he stayed long before he came, either bicause he could have no lucky signes of the sacrifices, or els for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereuppon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deserred to marche for seare, went him selfe first into the field, with certen light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes seeing them give charge, could hold no lenger, but followed him also, stragling out of the campe one after an other disorderly, and so did D fet apon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowen, all the other dispersed them selves, and Plutarke him felf fled. Then certen bandes of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time. Phoeion having ended his facrifice, the ATHENTANS came out of their campe, and fer apon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them also they flue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell should stand still, to receive their men that were feattered vp and downe the fieldes: and in the meane space, he him felie, with the choycest men of his armie, gaue charge apon the enemies. The fight was cruell betwene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, ventring their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their generall, (Glaucus, the fonne of Polymedes, and Thallus, the E fonne of Cineas) caried the praise away. And so did Cleophanes that daye also shewe him selfe very valiant. For he crying out still apon the horsemen that fled, & perswading them to come and helpe their generall that was in daunger: brought them backe againe, and thereby gotte the footemen the victorie. After this battell he draue Platarke out of ERETRIA, and tookethe caffell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the He draweth to a straightness enuyronned on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his mento take any GRZ CIANS prisoners, fearing least the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people fodeinly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these thinges were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederats of the ATHENIANS straight wishe for his instice and curtefie: and the ATHENIANS them selves also knewe his skilfulnes and marihood.

For his fucceffor Moloffus, that was generall for the rest of the warre, delt so vndiscreezely that he him felfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip beeing put in maruailous great hope;

went with all his armie into Hallespont, perfivading him felfe, that he should straight take all CHERRONES VS, the cities of Perintheand Bazantivm. The Athenians thereuppone determining to fend ayde, to preuent king Philips commings the Orators made great fate, that chares might be chosen Captaine. But he being fent thither with a good number of thippes, did no feruice worthy commendacion, neither would the cities receiue his natife into their hauens: but being suspected of every man, and despised of his enemies, he was driven to sayle vn and downe, and to get money of the allyes. The people being incenfed by the Orators, were marueloully offended, & repented them selues that they had sentayde vnto the BIZANTINES. Then Photion rifing vp, spake vnto the people, & told them, that it was no reason that mistrufling their confederats they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Capa raines that deserued to be mistrusted. For they, said he, doe make your consederats affraide of you, who without you notwithstanding can not saue themselves. The people chaunging their mindes by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and fent him with an armie into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederate there, which was of great importance to faue the citie of BYZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions same was so great, that Cleon, the greatest man of vertue and authoritie in BIZANTIVM, and had before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy: he made fute for him vnto the citie. Then the BYZANTINES would not fuffer Photion fahim (though he desired it) to campe without the walls of their citie, but opening their gates, we the citie received him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongest them. Who, perceiving how much the Citizens trusted them, did so honestly behave them selves in their conversation amongest o them, that they gaue them no maner of cause to complaine of them; and shewed them selves to valiant befides in all battells and conflicts, that Philip (which before was hought dreadfull and inuincible, every man beeing affraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HBL- Phoció drave LESPONT without anything done, and to his great discredit: where Phocion wanne some of Philip out of his shippes, and recoursed agains the strong holdes, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Hellespons. Furthermore, making divers invalions into his contries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was fore hurt there, and so driven to returne home againe, by meanes of a great armie that came against him, to defend the contry : Shortly after, the MEGARIANS Secretly sent vnto him, to deliuer their citie into his hands. Phoesion fearing if the Bos o Tians vnderstoodit, vnto Athen. that they would preuent him: he called a common affembly earely in the morning, & told the D people what message the MAGARIANS had sent vnto him. The people apon his motion being determined to ayde them: Phocion straight founding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the aifembly, gaue them no further leyfure, but to take their weapons, and so led them incontinents ly to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiving him, Phocion thut vp the hauen of NISEA, and brought two long walls from the citie vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: Whereby he stood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the fea, the ATHENIANS were Lordes of its Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open warre against king Philip, and had chosens other Captaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the lles: about all thinges, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly searing the daunger) to accept the condicions of peace. Then one of these busy Orators that was still accusing one or others E faid vnto him:why, Phocio, how darest thou attept to turne the ATHENIANS frowarre; having now their swordes in their hands? yes truely, said Phocion: though in warre I know I thal commaund thee, &cin peace thou wilt commaund me . But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demosthenes caried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTIC A as they could: I pray thee friend, o Photion vnto him, let vs nor diffpute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall ouercome, the which if we can so bring to passe, be sure we shall put the warre faree enough from vs. For men that are ouercome, becuer in feare and daunger, wherefocuer they be. When the ATHENTANS had lolt a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators that hunted after innouacion, preferred Charidemus to be chosen generall of the ATHENIANS: whereuppon, the Magistrates & Senatours F being affraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the Arboragirs, they made such earnest sute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much a doe) they obteyined that the affaires of the citie might be put into Phocions handes & government.

Hethought good to accept the articles and gentle condicions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moued that the citie of ATHEN SWOULD enter into the common treatie of peace, & common affembly of the states of GRECE, procured at king Phi. lips request: Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might understand what demaunds Phi. lip would make at the affembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruerfies of time could not be liked of them, & that he faw the Athenians foone after repented them that they did not followe his counsell, when they heard they should furnish king Philip with shippes and horsemen; then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made meto withstand that, which now ye have consented vnto. But fithence it is so that you have nowe past your consents, you must be contented, and not be discoraged at it: remembring that your auncestors in times past have sometyme commaunded, and other while obeyed others, and b yet haue fo wifely and discreetely gouerned them selues in both fortunes, that they hauenor onely faued their citie, but all GRECE besides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ion would straight haue made bonfires and facrifices to the goddes for the good To relegie as newes: but Phosion would not fuffer them, and fayd, that it was a token of a base minde, to reioyce at any mans death, & befides that, the armie which ouerthrew you at CHERONEA, hath not yet lost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speake ill of Alexander, and specially when he was so neare THEBBS with his armie: Phocion rehearsed vnto him thefe veries of Homer

What, when there is such a great fire kindled, will thou cast the citie into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not fuffer them to cast them selues away: forto that ende haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernment. And afterwards also, when Ale-

xander had rased the citie of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demosthenes, Lycurque, Hyperides, and Caridemus, and that the whole assembly and counsell not knowing what aunswer to make, did all cast their eyes vppon Phosion, and cryed vnto him to fay his opinion: he then rose vppe, and taking one of his friendes vnto him called Nicotles. whome he loued and trusted about all men els, he sayd thus openly vnto them. These men n whome Alexander requireth, have brought this citie to this extremitie, that if he required Nicocles here, I would give my confent to deliver him: For I would thinke my felfe happy to lose my life, for all your safetie. Furthermore, though I am right hartely sory (sayd he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the citie for succour: yet I affure ye, it is better one citie mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is best to intreate the Conqueror for both, rather then to our certeine destruction to fight with him that is the stronger. It is favd also that Alexander refused the first decree which the people offered him vppon Phocionstequest, and sent awaye the Ambassadors, and would not speake with them. But the second, which Phocion him felfe brought, he tooke: beeing tolde by his fathers olde feruaunts, that king Philip made great accompt of him. Whereuppon, Mexander did not onely giue him au- E dience, and graunt his request, but further followed his counsell. For Phocion perswaded him, an, by Phoei. if he loued quietnes, to leave warre: if he defired fame, then, that he should make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phoeion feeding Alexanders humor with fuch talke and discourse as he thought would like him best: he so altered and softened Alexanders disposition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS should looke to their affayres, for if he should dye, he knewe no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, bicause he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend: he made so much of him, that he more honored him, then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Duris the historiographer writeth, that when Alexander was growen very great, and had ouercome king Darius: he left out of his letters this worde Chærin (to wit, joy, and p health) which he vsed-commonly in all the letters he wrote, and would no more honor any other with that maner of falutacion, but Phocion, & Antipater. Chares also writeth the fame. And

A they all doe confesse, that Alexander Sent Phocion a great gift out of Asia, of a hundred filuer relents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Photion asked them that brought it why brander gaue him fuch a great reward, about all the other Citizens of ATHERS. Bigaufe, favd they, he onely esteemeth thee to be a good, and honest man. Phocion replied agains, then let him give me leave to be that I feeme, & am, whileft I live. The Meffengers would not fo leave him but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandrie. & thriftines: For they found his wife her felfe baking, and he him felfe drewe water before them, out of the well to wash his feete. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings present, and were offended with him, saying it was a shame for Alexanders friend to live fo miferably and beggerly as he did. Then Phoeion feeing a poore old man goe by, in a threedebare gowne, asked them, whether they thought him worse then her No. God forbid, aunswered they againe. Then replied he againe, he lines with leffe then I do. and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be short, faid he, it I should take this summe of mo.: Photion yer ney and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on thother side, if I occupy it, I shall make: we and integrity flow all the citie speake ill of the king and me both. So this great present was sent backe from A: of Mexam. THENS, whereby he shewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not such golde & ders money. filter, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote again vnto Phocion, that he did not reckon them his friendes, that would take nothing of him: Photion notwithstanding would! not take the money, but onely requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at libertie, which were kept prisoners in the citie of SARDIS, for certeine accusations lavde against them: Echecratides the Rhetorician, Athenodorus borne in the citie of IMBROS, and two Co-RINTHIANS, Demaratus and Spartus, Alexander presently set them at libertie, and sent Craterius into MACEDO Recommaunding him to give Phocion the choyce of one of these four ecities of ASIA, which he liked best: CIOS, GERGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELEA: sending him worde, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuse this offer, then he was at the first. But Phosion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after dyed. Phosions house is seene yet at this day in the village of Marita fet forth with plates of copper, but on Photions therwise very meane, and without curiositie. For his wives he maryed, there is no mention boule and made of the first, saving that Cephisodotus the image graver was her brother. But for his second wife the was no leffe famous at ATHENS for her honeftie, and good housewiverie; then Pho-O cion, for his inflice and equitie. And for proofe thereof, it is reported, that the ATHENIANS beeing one days affembled in the Theater to fee news tragedies played, one of the players when he shoulde have comen apon the scaffolde to have played his parte, asked the setter forth of the playes, the apparell of a Queene, and certeine Ladyes to wayte uppon her, bycause he was to playe the parte of the Queene. The setter forth of the playes denying him? the player went awaye in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and woulde not come our vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the playes, compelling him. brought him by force on the lage, and cryed out vnto him? Dooft thou not fee Phocions wife, that goeth uppe and downe the citie, with one mayde onely wayting on her? and with thou playe the foole, and marre the modefice of the women of ATHENS? The people hea-I mighis wordes, filled all the Theater with toye and clapping of handes. The fame Ladye, when a certaine gentlewoman of I on in came to A THEN's to fee her , and thewed her all hen riche jewells and precious frones the had! the dunfwered her against all my riches and jewells; is my husband Photion, who thefetwenty yeares together; hath continually beene chofen generall for the A THENYANS . Photions fonne telling his father off a tyme whathe was Photous, Phodesirous to contend with other younge men for the victorie, who should cuming liest leape what he was out, and gette vope agayne into the charretts or coches, running their full course, at the fealtes Panathen aat ATHENS: his father was contented he shoulde, not that he was desirous his forme shoulde have the honor of the victorie, but bicause by this honest exercise he should growe to better manner, for that he was a dissolute younge man, and much given to

I wine. Yet he wanne the victorie at that tyme, and there were divers of his fathers friendes, that prayed him to doe them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victorie in

fine and superfluous thinges prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweete smelling fpices to washe the seete of the bydden guestes as they came to the feast: Whereuppon be called his sonne to him, and asked him, howe canst thou abyde Phoese, that our friend should thus diferace the victorie with excesse? But bicause he would withdrawe his some from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there amonge younge boves brought vppe after the LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it. to fee that Phocion did fo much despise his owne contrie manner and facions. Also when Demades the Orator one daye fayde vnto Phocion: why doe we not perswade the ATHENIANS TO liue after the Laconian manner? As forme (sayde he) if thou wilt make one to sette it forwarde: I am ready to be the first man to moue the matter. In deede, o Phocion, thou arta meete man to perswade the ATHEN IANS to line LACONIAN like, in common together at their meales, and to prayle Lycurgus straight lawe: that art thy selfe commonly so persumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another tyme when Alexander wrote letters vnto ATHENS to fende him some shippes, and that the Orators perswaded them not to graunt him, the people called vppon Phocion chiefly to fave his opinion: then Phocion tolde them plaintly, me thinkes ye must eyther make your selues the strongest in warres, or beeing the weaker, procure to be friendes vnto the stronger. Pythias, a newcome Orator, beeing full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speake in enery matter: Wherefore Phocion sayde voto him. good goddes, will this noues neuer leave babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieuetenant of the prouince of BABYLON, fledde out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with 6 a greate summe of golde and filter: straight these men that solde their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a fight of swallowes. And he stucke not to give every one of them a peece of money to baffe them with: for it was a trifle to him, confidering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion him selfe, he sent vnto him seuen hundred talents, and offered him felie and all that he had into his handes of truft. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe aunswer, and tolde him, that he woulde make him repentit, if he corrupted the citie of Athens in that manner. So Harpalus beeing amated therewith , left him at that tyme, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIANS fate in counsell about him, he perceived that those which had taken his mor ney, were shronke from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should have excu- h fed him, to bleere the world, that men should not suspecte them they had beene corrupted and that Phocion on thother fide which had refused his money, having respect to the common wealth, had also some regarde to fauchis life: he once more attempted all the wayes he could to wynne him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could cary the man, Then Harpalus falling in friendshippe with Charieles (Phocions sonne in lawe) he made him to beill spoken of, and greatly suspected, bicause men sawe that he trusted him in all thinges, and employed him in all his affayres. As, in committing to his trust the making of a sumpl tuous tombe for Pythonice, the famous Curtifan that was deade, whom he loued, and by whome he had a Daughter; the taking apon him whereof was no leffe thame ynto Charidan then the finishing thereof was disgrace vato him. This tombe is seene vato this daye in a place called Hermium, in the hie waye from ATHENSTO ELEVSIN: the workemanshippe thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to beggin uen by Harpalas vnto Charieles, for the finishing of the same . Furthermore, after Harpalan death. Charicles and Phocion tooke his Daughter, and carefully brought her yppe. After wardes allo. Charicles beeing accused for the money he had taken of Harnolms, be beforeby his father in lawe Phoeion, to helpe to case him in his judgement. But Phoeion flatly denyed him, and fayde; Charieles, I tooke thee for my sonne in lawe, in all honest and just causes onely. Furthermore, when Aclepiades, the sonne of Hipparchus, brought the first newes of the deathe of Kinge Alexander, Demades the Orator woulde not beliegue him : for fayde he, if it were true, all the earthe woulde smell of the fauour of his corfe. Phon I on: he went about to brydle and pacific them. But when many of the Orators gotte uppe.

A to the pulpitte for orations, and cryed out, that Aclepiades newes were true of Aleranders deathe: well then, o Phosion, if it bee true to daye, it shall be true also to morrowe, and the next day after. And therefore my Maisters, bee not too hafty but thinke of it at better leyfure, and fette your affayres at a fure staye. When Leost henes also by his practife had brought the citie of ATHENSINTO the warre called the GREEK BS warre, and in skorne asked Phocion, that was offended at it, what good he had done to the common wealth fo many yeares together as he had beene Generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion aunswered him, no small good, sayde he, for all my contrye men haue beene burved at home in their owne graues . Another tyme Leosthenes speaking prowdely and insolently to the people, Phocion one daye fayde vnto him : younge man my friende, thy wordes are a lyke to a Cypres tree, which is highe and greate, but beareth no frute. Then Hyperides vifing uppe, asked Phocion: when wilt thou then counfell the ATHENIANS to make waste? when I shall see younge men, sayde he, not for sake their rancks, riche men liberall, and O+ rators leave to robbe the common wealth. When the ATHENJANS wondred to fee fuche a goodly greate armie as Leosthenes had leavied: and that they asked Phocion howe he lyked its A goodly armie, o he, for a furlonge, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre; for I doe not see the citie able to make any more money, nor moe shippes a neyther vet any moe fouldiers than these. The which proved true, as infell out afterwardes! For at the first, Leosthenes did notable exployts. He ouercame the Boso wans in battelkand draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the A THENIANS in suche a hope and c jolitie, that they made continuall feaftes and facrifices through the citie, to thanke the gods for these good newes. And there were some among them, that to take Phocion in a trippe. asked him if he did not with that he had done all those things? yes in deede, aunswered he. I would I had done them, but yet I would not have given the counselve have done them. Ano. ther tyme also when letters came, dayly, one after an other, bringing good newes, good gods, favde he, when shall we leave to ouercome. When Leosthenes was deade in this voyage. they that feared Phocion (houlde bee appoynted Captayne in his place, and that he woulde pacific the warres did thrust in a man of means hadion, and waknowen, that fayde in the affemblie he was Phocions friende and schoolefellowe, and therefore befought the people that they woulde foare Phocion, bicause they had not fuche another man as he and that they D woulde make Antiphilus Generall of their armie. The people were contented withall? But then Phocion floode vppe, and fayde, that this man was never scholler with him, nevther did he euer knowe him before that tyme : but nowe fayde he oftom henceforth I will take thee for my friende, for thou half given the people the best counsell for me. The people notwithstanding determining to make warre with the Bor otions. Photion spake against it all he coulde. Thereuppon, his friendes bidding him beware of suche speeches, Howe he did offende the people, least they killed him: he aunswered them, they shall wrongefully put me to death, o he, speaking for the benefitte of my contrye; but otherwise they shall haue reason to doe it, if I speake to the contrarged But when he sawe nothing woulde pacifiethem, and that they went on still with their intents then he commaunded the Herawlde E to proclayme by founde of tromper, that all Citizens from fourteene yeares to three foore, able to cary weapon, should prefently uppon breaking up of thatfembly, arme them selves, and followe him with fine dayes pronision for vittells. Then was there greate sturre amonge them in the citie, and the olde men came and complayned vinto him if for his ouerstraight commaundement. He tolde them agayne, I doeyou no weonger for I am fourerskore my felfe, and yet will goe with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that tyme, and quenched their fond delire of warre 1. But when all the fea coast was full of fouldiers both of the MACED ONIANS, and other fraungers which were ledde by Midlin their Captainby that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNY'S ; and poyled the contry thereabdures: then Phocion ledde the AYHENIANS thither . But when he was there, divers taking wpon them the F office of a Lieucrenant, and going about to counfell him, fome to lodge his campeypon fuch a hill, and others to fend his horsemen to such a place, and others to campe here: O Herenles, ghe, how many Captaines doe I fee, and how fewe fouldiers? Afterwardes when he had fee YYY ii

him: but the ATHENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe againe to his place. Then faul

one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddest placed the felfe? So Phocion giving charge apon the enemies, he overthrew them, and flue Micion their Captaine, with divers others. Furthermore, the armie of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wanne a battell against Antipater, and Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of Asia: where Leonatus was flaine in the field. Antiphilus beeing generall of the footemen, and Menon THESSALIAN, Colonell of the horse. men. Shortly after, Cratersu comming out of Asiainto Evrope with a great armie, they R fought a battell by the citie of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were ouerthrowen; yet was not the ouerthrowe nor flaughter greate, although it came through the disobedience of the fouldiers to their Captaines, which were but young men, and vsed them ouer gently, Moreouer, when Antipater practifed to make their cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and shamefully for fooke to defend their common libertie: Whereuppon Antipater marched forthwith with his armie, to the citie of ATHENS. Demosthenes and Hyperides understanding that, for sooke the citie. Then Demades, that was in diffrace and defamed for lacke of payment of fuch fynesas were set voon his head (being seuen seuerall times condemned, bicause he had so many tymes moued matters contrary to the law) and could not therefore be fuffered any more to speake in the affembly, was then dispensed withall, and licensed to speake: whereuppon he moued the c people to fend Ambassadors vnto Amipater, with full commission & authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans trust this absolute authoritie to treate of peace: they called for Phocion, laying, that he onely was to be trufted with the ambaffade. Then Phocion aunswered them: if you had beleeued my former counsells I alwaies gaue you, such weighty matters should not now have troubled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by Phocion Am. the people, Phocion was fent Ambassador vnto Antipater, that laye then in the castell of Cadmea, being ready at that time to inuade the contrye of ATTICA. Phoeson first requested him. that before he removed from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterin presently aunswered him: Phocion, thy request is vareasonable, that lying here we should eate out our friendes, and destroy their contry: when we may line of our enemies, and enriche our fi felues with their spoyle. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, tolde him: we must needes doe Phocion this pleasure. And for the rest, touching the capitulacions of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS (hould fend them a blancke, and referre the condicions of peace vnto them: like as he him selfe being beseeged in the citie of L AMIA, had referred all capitulacions and articles of peace, vnto the discression of Leosthenes their generall. So when Phocion was come backeto Athens, the Athenians feeing there was no remedie, were compelled to be contented with fuch offer of peace, as the enemie made them. Then Phocion was fent back against to Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors ioyned in commission with him: amongest whom also, was that famous Philosopher Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man fo prowd, cruel, difdainful, nor hafty E of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would foften and qualific him, and make him to reuerence him. But yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerse nature, which hated all vertue : for he imbraced all the reft, & would not once falute Xenocrates. Whereuppon, some say, that Xenocrates said then: Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a witnes of the discurtesie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates beganneto speake. Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the ende commaunded him to holde his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater aunswered them: that he would make peace with the A THENIANS, To they delivered him Demofthener and Hyperides: that they should keepe their auncient lawes and gouernment, that they should receine a garrifon into the hauen of Munychia, that they should defray the charges of this warre, and also paye a raunsome besides. All the other Ambassadors but Xenocrates, willing ly accepted these condictions of peace, as very reasonable and fauourable: but he sayde

Xenocrates despised of Antipater. A that for flaues, Antipater did handle them fauorably : but for free men, he deleted hardly with them. Then Phocion befought him that he would yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is fayde) aunswered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, faning that which should vadoe thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater fayd not fo, but asked him, if he would become fuertie for the ATHENIANS, that they thould attempt no alteracion, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrison. Phoeson then holding his peace, & delaying auniwer, there was one Callimedon furnamed Carabos, (a bolde man, and hated the libertie of the people) that hrake forth in these words:if Phocion were so fond to give his word for the A THENIANS, WOULdest thou, Antipater, beleue him therefore, and leave to doe that thou hast determined? Thus were the ATHENIANS drive to receive the garrison of the MACEDONIANS of the which Memyllus was captaine, an honest man, and Photions friend. This commandement to receive the garrison within the hauen of Munichya, was found very stately, and done by Antipater, rather of a vaine glory to boast of his power; then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the castell, he further increased their griefe: bicause the garrison entred the twenty day of Boedromion (to wit, the moneth of August) on the which the feast day of their misteries was celebrated, at what time they make their procesfion called Iacchus, from the citie of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therefore the folemnitie of this holy feast beeing thus confused, many beganne to consider that in olde tyme when their Realme did flourishe, there were heard and seene voyces and images of the goddes on that day, which made the enemies both afraid, and amazed: and nowe in contrary manner, in the very felfe fame folemnitie of the gods, they fawe the greatest calamitie that could have happened vnto GR RCR. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yere through before, became then too prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and event, that ever happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the loffe of their libertie. For not many yeares before, there was brought an oracle from Dodone vnto Athens: that they shoulde looke well to the rockes of Diana, that straungers shoulde not possesse them. And about that tyme also, the Professions couerings with the which they doe adorne the holy beddes of the mysteries, beeing wette of the Albert with water, became from a purple culler which they had before, to looke vellowe and pale, night as it had beene the courring of a deade bodie. Yea, and that which was most to bee won-D dered at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the fame water, they did without chaunging keepe their culler they had before, When one of the Ministers of the temple also did washe a little pygge in the sea, in a cleane place by the wharfe: there fod ainely came a greate fifthe that bytte at it, and carved the hinder partes of the pygge cleane awaye with it. Whereby men conjectured that the goddes did fignific vnto them , that they should lose the lowest parte of their citie nearest to the feat and should keepe the highest partes thereof. This notwithstanding, the garrison did not offend nor trouble the ATHEN IANS, bicause of the honestie of their Captaine Menyllus. Now there were aboue twelve thowfand Citizens, that for their pouertie loft the benefit of their freedome: of the which, parte of them remayned at ATHENS, vintowhome it feemed they E offered great wronge and injurie; and parte of them also went into Thracia, where Anthpater affigned them townes and landes to inhabite. They feemed to be men like ynto them that had beene taken by affaulte, or by feege within a citie, which had beene compelled to forfake their contrie. Furthermore, the snamefull death of Demosthenes in the Ile of Ca. The cracking LAVRIA, and of HYPERIDES, by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we have written heretofore) were almost occasion given them to lament the tymes of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was flayne, they that had ouercomen him, were fo cruell vnto their subjectes: that a laborer in the contrie of Phay GIA digging the earthe, beeing asked what he fought for, aunswered, fighing: I seeke for antigonus. Then many men beganne to fay as much, when they remembred the noble mindes of those F two great Princes, howe mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their difpleasure: not like Intipater, who crastily cloked his tyrannicall power which he vsurped, by beeing famillier, going simplely apparelled, and faring meanely; and yet showed him

810 felfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lorde and tyrant vnto them whome he had ouercome. A Neuertheles. Phocion obtayned of him the restoring agayne of divers men, whome he had banished: and those whome he coulde not gette to bee restored, yet he procured that they fhoulde not be banished into so farre contries, as others which had beene sent beyonde the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tanarus out of GRECE, but that they had libertie to remayne within the contrie of PELOPONNESUS: amonge the which, was one 49. nonides a Sycophant, and falle accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remayned in ATHENS with great inflice and lenitie, and fuch as he knewe to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to some office: but such as he sawe were fantastyke people, and defirous of chaunge, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished awaye of them selves, and learned in tyme to love the contrye, and to followers, lage. When he sawe Xenocrates also paye a certeine pension or tribute to the common wealth, which all straungers dwelling in ATHENS did vie yearely to paye: he would have made him a free man, and offered to put his name amongest the number of free Citizens.

But Xenocrates refused it, saying, he woulde have no parte of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof, he had beene fent Ambaffador. And when Menyllus had fent Phocion money, he made him aunswer: that Menyllus was no greater Lorde then Alexander had beene, nevther had he at that tyme any greater occasion to receyue his present, then when he had refused King Alexanders gyfte. Menyllus replying agayne, fayde: that if he had no neede of it for him felfe, yet he might let his fonne Phoese haue it. But Phoeson aunfwered: if my fonne Phoese will leave his naughtye lyfe, and become an honest man, that c which I will leave him. shall serve his turne very well: but if it bee so that he will still holde on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. An other tymealfo he aunswered Antipater more roundely, when he woulde have had him done an unhonest thinge: Antipater, sayde he, can not have me his friende, and flatterer both. Antipater selfe was wont to saye, that he had two friendes in ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which the coulde never make the one to take any thinge of him, and the other, he coulde neuer fatisfie him. And truely Phocions pouertye was a greate glorye of his vertue. fythe he was growen olde, continuing in the fame, after he had beene fo many tymes generall of the ATHENIANS, and had receyued suche friendshippe and curtesie, of so many Kinges and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarye delighted to shewe his riches in D thinges that were contrarye to the lawes of the citie. For, a decree beeing made at ATHENS. commaunding that no straunger, uppon forfeyture of a thowsand Drachmas to bee payed by the defrayer of the daunces to the citie, shoulde bee any of the Dauncers that daunced at any common playes or sportes: Demades one daye making certeyne games and sportes at his owne charges, brought a hundred Dauncers of straungers at one tyme, and withall, brought also a hundred thowsand Drachmas to paye the forfeyture thereof. Another Tyme when he maryed his fonne Demas, he fayde vnto hint: fonne, when I maryed thy mother, there was fo fmall rofte, that my next neyghbour knewe not of it: where nowe at thy maryage, Kinges and Princes are at the charge of the feafte. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phoeion to goe to Antipater, to intreate him to take E his garrison out of their citie: he still refused the ambassade, eyther bycause he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he fawe the people more obedient vnto reason, for searc of the garrison. Howebeit he obtayned of Antipater, that he shoulde not bee too hastye in demaundinge of his money, but shoulde deferre it tyll a further tyme. So the ATHENTANS perceiuing they could doe no good with Phoeson, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter you him, and went with his fonne into M ACEDON, whether doubtles his destine caried him to his viter destruction, even at that very time when Antipater was fallen sicke of a diffease whereof he dyed: Whereby the affayres of the Realme went through the handes of Callander his fonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had fent vnto Antigonus in A STA, willing him to come in all possible speede so winne GRECE and MACEDON, F which hong but of an old rotte threde, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherfore Cassander being advertised of his arrival, he made him presently to be apprehended, & setting his some

A hard by him, flue him before his father, so neere him, that the blood of his some forang visor. The onform him: to that the father was all bloodied with the murther of his fonne. Then Caffander casting Demotes in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treason against his father gouing him all the reproachfull words he could deuise: at the length he slue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death, had established Polyperchon General of the armie of the M AC BD ON 1-ANS. & Cassander his forme, only Colonell of a thowfand footemen. He now with franching after the armie of his fathers decease, taking you him the government of the realme: fent Nitamor with speede the Macedo to succeede Menillus in the Captaineship of the gazzison of ATHENS, before his death should he reuealed, commaunding him first in any case, to take the castell of Munychia, which he did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vaderstanding of the death of Antipater, they accused R Phoeion, for that he had knowen of his death long before, and yet kept it fecres to pleafe Nicsnor. But Phoseon regarded not this accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor: whom he handled so wisely, that he made him not only fredly varouthe A THENIANS. but furthermore perswaded him to be at some charge to geue the people the passime of common playes, which he made to be done at his coft. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had confined a the government of the kings person, meaning to geue Caffander a stampant and blurt, he sent gainst Pholetters pattentes vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did restore vnto cion them their popular state againe, and commaunded that all the ATHENIANS should vie their former auncient lawes of their citie. This was a wile & craftie fetche against Phosion. For Polyperchon desufting this practife to get the city of ATHENS into his hands (as it fel out afterwards C by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, vales he found meanes first to banish Phocians and thought that he shoulde easily bring that to passe, when suche as had before bene put of their freedom, by his meanes, should come againe to have voyces in thassembly, and that the feditious Orators and accusers might be turned at liberty againe, to say what they would. The ATHENIANS having heard the contentes of these letters pattentes, beganne to be somewhat. quickened, and moued withall : whereupon Nisanor defiring to speake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was affembled in the hauen of Piraz: he went and hazarded his person. amongest them, apon Phoeions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being secretly advertised thereof, and in the field, not farre from the citie, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor having warning of it in time, faued him felfe. Then it appeared, that Ni-
